OFFICE OF THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

charged with the duty of affixing the stamp, the tax will practically come out of their pockets or out of the pockets of the consumers, and whether the retailer can charge it over or not is a question that I refer to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If the Senator will allow me, he will remember the complaint made by the retail dealers was that it would not be fair to oblige them to go through their stock and put stamps upon all the stock on hand, because they were carrying a large amount of stock they never would sell, which they call dead stock.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; that is true.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If, however, the stamp is only to be placed on articles which are sold, it would be satisfactory.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that will be satisfactory.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that to be in the main true; but it seems to me that the same rule ought to apply to wholesale dealers as to retail dealers.

Mr. COCKRELL. How can you determine what stock is on hand on the day this bill goes into effect?

Mr. ALLISON. There is no opportunity of knowing, of course, and the only way whereby it can be ascertained is to rigidly enforce the rule against manufacturers and compounders. There will be probably some little difficulty in enforcing it in every way, but Senators will remember that there is only a tax of 1 cent in each particular instance, or a half cent, or a quarter of a cent, as the case may be. The judgment, I think, of the committee and of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is that there is not likely to be any very great fraud in connection with the administration of this provision.

Mr. MONEY. I should like to ask another question of the Senator before he takes his seat. The Senator mentioned a moment ago that it was the intention of the committee to discuss this provision of the bill to-morrow, and he also said to the Senate that the wholesale dealers ought to be in the same position the retail dealers are as to the payment of the tax on the stock on hand and unsold.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not say that.

Mr. MONEY. I understood the Senator to state that to be his opinion.

Mr. ALLISON. I say it seems to me, since this provision has been reported from the committee, that perhaps we ought to include the wholesale dealers as well as the retail dealers; but I only speak for myself, and not for anybody else.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to ask, Is it the Senator's intention to introduce an amendment to that effect?

Mr. ALLISON. It is not at present. I shall subject myself in that case, as I always do, to the majority of my brethren on the committee.

Mr. FRYE. But with great reluctance.

Mr. ALLISON. With perhaps great reluctance, except in the cases which I specified on Monday.

Mr. MONEY. From the Senator's previous statement, I hoped that he would offer an amendment in the line which has been suggested.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I was glad to hear the Senator from Iowa express the unanimous sense which was entertained in the committee as to the retroactive clause of this bill as affecting the subject of tobacco. I wish that that general sense of objection to retroactive taxes could be made applicable throughout in every topic that is taxed. While that subject has been called to the attention of the Senate, I beg to make the observation that a very little reflection on the practical operation of this tax will satisfy a just-minded man, in my opinion, that it is a very impolitic and very wrongful tax.

Tobacco is now taxed 6 cents per pound. The bill as it came from the House doubled the tax to 12 cents per pound. The Senate amendment has increased the tax to 16 cents per pound. The bill as it came from the House made the tax of 12 cents a pound applicable not only to all future manufactures of tobacco, but to all stocks of tobacco which are now on hand, having been manufactured under the laws of the Government and having already paid the tax required when the manufacture took place.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I understand—I do not know whether the Senator from Virginia has been so advised—that the tobacco-tax matter, regarding which I fully agree with him, is to be reconsidered in the committee to-morrow. I merely mention the fact so that perhaps we may be able to avoid some trouble about it. I think the Senator is right in his position about it, and I simply give him the information.

Mr. DANIEL. I was not aware of that fact, but while the matter has been brought to the attention of the Senate, I wish to advise my colleagues of what, according to my information from the tobacco trade, are serious and substantial objections to the retroactive feature which appears in the bill as it came from the House and which happily, as I conceive, the Senate committee has canceled.

Let us take the case of a merchant or manufacturer who has a stock of tobacco on hand. He has complied with all the demands of the Government and has paid in advance his tax of 6 cents per pound. Then his whole scheme of investment, his estimates of cost of raw material and of labor and of marketing his products are absolutely thrown to the winds by the intervention of a new element of cost, and his goods are thrown entirely out of their relation to the market which they were projected to possess, and which they would possess but for this interposition of a new and unanticipated and unanticipatable incident.

Further than that, it deranges the business of every man who may have tobacco on hand for sale and subjects him perhaps to an absolutely ruinous burden in this wise. We will take the case of tobacco which is put up in packages of six or eight packages per pound. Each of those packages has a stamp. A box may contain 100, 300, 400, 500, or a thousand of those packages. The commission merchant or the purchaser of the tobacco who may have it for sale, by the subjection of this new tax, has got to take the goods asunder, take out every package and put on a new stamp, a burden of labor cost in addition to the tax itself which is almost immeasurable.

Then, Mr. President, it is a burden which the person who may have the tobacco in stock is wholly unprepared to bear, a burden which, indeed, could be but poorly borne by any one but the original manufacturer. The original manufacturer, having the raw tobacco in hand, with expert hands employed to handle it, assort and arranges his tobacco and puts it up in little bunches and packages and in large boxes and sends it off to the market. He can do the work at a minimum cost and with readiness and ease. But the man in whose hands the tobacco has gone for the purpose of the retail trade or for mercantile distribution in a market center is wholly unprepared for the work. He has to break open the box and he has to segregate, separate, and rehandle every package. He has to do it with his force, which may be totally unprepared and inexperienced in the business, and the burden of doing the thing which he is required to do by law may amount to as much or more than the tax itself. No one but an expert could calculate it, but any one, even the most inexpert, can see that it is a heavy burden, distracting to the trade, and obnoxious to every element of fair business.

There has come from every mercantile center in the United States a storm of protests against the retroactive clause upon tobacco. There are many manufacturers and traders in tobacco in my own State, and every one with whom I have communicated or of whom I have any knowledge urges the Congress not to impose upon their trade and business this burden. It is inconceivable, Mr. President, that any one in the tobacco trade should desire such a tax, should tolerate the idea of such a tax upon any other basis than that it would ruin all small competitors and leave the business in the hands of a few monopolies. There is not a single suggestion of sound reason or of business sagacity which could induce any person who has any mercantile or manufacturing connection with the subject-matter to be otherwise than bitterly opposed to it.

Then, Mr. President, it is unjust per se. All tax laws ought to contemplate their subjects as much as possible in perspective, and in the perspective of futurity. It is a great burden to impose upon a particular trade in this country which is segregated from all other trades. None of those who are willing to impose it upon the tobacco trade would sit patient if we undertook to deal with any merchant or manufacturer of the thousand and one necessities and luxuries of life in the same way. It would ruin any public man and any party that undertook to apply that scheme of taxation to the general business of this country. It would lead to a political revolution.

It is unjust per se, Mr. President, because it imposes the burden of a heavier capital to handle the trade which no man could have contemplated in his business, and in just so far as it contemplates a heavier burden of capital and a like heavier burden of labor, so it throws the vantage ground in the play to those who have such tremendous capital and such large facilities of labor that they may profit by the wreck and ruin of those who are struggling in competition with them.

Mr. President, I have found in my own State, and I doubt not that such is the experience of every other Senator here in dealing with his own constituents, the expression of a perfect willingness on the part of the people to bear their just share of any burden which the war with Spain may impose. I am glad to say for those whom I have the honor to represent in part that while very many of them do dislike the idea of having the tax on their business doubled, I have not received a protest or an unpleasant criticism or any comment otherwise than what was patriotic upon this subject.

They have all said, "We expect to be taxed, and we are willing to be taxed, and desire to make our contribution, whatever it may be, to the cause of the country at this time; but we do object and we do not think it is reasonable or just that we should be separated from the rest of the business community, from our fellow-citizens in all other parts of the country, and should have imposed upon us a tax which means infinite irritation, entanglement, complication, and in many cases absolute ruin." I do not believe, Mr. President, that in the reflecting and fair-minded Senate, nor, indeed, if the matter were fully canvassed and thoroughly understood in the House, this tax would have a corporal's guard to support and commend it. I hope when the time comes to vote the Senate may be as unanimous in its conclusion as the committee up to date has been in its recommendation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as the Senator from Iowa says the committee will take up this question to-morrow, I desire to say a word with reference to the question of these taxes upon the druggists. My information is not such as has been intimated by some other Senators, that the proposed arrangement satisfies them. They do not think that what is commonly called, whether properly or not, a retroactive tax should be imposed, whether it be arranged in one way or the other.

Very much that could be said upon this subject has already been said by the Senator from Virginia as applicable to tobacco, and it applies with equal force to the proposed retroactive tax upon drugs. But what I want to call the Senator's attention to particularly is this: It would manifestly be an extremely great hardship to impose the tax and require its immediate payment upon all stocks in hand. It would be unbearable, if such should be the case, for the reason stated by the Senator from Connecticut; and the point to which I desire to call the Senator's attention is that the proposed arrangement to tax each package as it is sold is not practicable, and therefore I hope the entire retroactive tax as to drugs will be abandoned. I say "drugs," using the term generically; I refer to all the things enumerated in this section and commonly sold in drug stores.

The Senate will remark that all the goods in a drug store are not liable to this tax, but only such as fall within the designation on the fifty-third page—those which are of a certain class, not by description, but those which are proprietary articles, those which are compounded by secret process, and there are various other definitions. I wish to call attention to the fact that the clerk in a large drug store has to be able to determine for himself in dealing with his customer whether or not that is one of the classes of goods liable to the tax. He can not every time a little sale is made by him go into the counting room to have the question discussed and determined. That is impracticable in the ordinary course of business. He must determine then and there, when he makes up the package and sells it, and before he wraps it, whether he shall put upon it the stamp.

It must be obvious to everyone that that is not practicable to be done. There is no class of business hardly in which there is such a great variety of goods to be sold as in the drug business, and yet every clerk must know and be able to determine promptly in such a way as not to impede the proper conduct of the business exactly whether that is a class of goods which falls within this definition or does not fall within it. Not only so, Mr. President, but—I counted them rapidly and I may not have counted them accurately—there are about sixteen or seventeen different grades of taxes imposed upon articles sold in a drug store. So the drug clerk has not only to determine whether an article is subject to the tax at all—and that is not an easy thing to do always—but he has to determine then and there promptly what is the proper tax to put upon it, whether it is one-quarter of a cent or 50 cents or whatever it may be. I say that in conducting a large business, and a great many of these are large businesses, or even in conducting the average drug business, it is not practicable to carry this method of taxation into effect and at the same time not impede the proper conduct of the business.

In view of the fact that it would not do to tax them all in advance by requiring them to put labels or stamps upon everything in the store, some of which might never be sold—as it is not practicable to do that in the ordinary course of business, and as there are the same general objections to this retroactive tax upon drugs that there are to the retroactive tax upon tobacco, it does seem to me the committee should eliminate this particular feature from the bill. It seems to me it is a class of merchandise that would naturally appeal to the Government not to impose a burden upon it. Largely the tax is going to fall upon the unfortunate, upon the invalid class, upon those who are sick, those, as it has been said by some one, who in a large measure are not able to employ doctors and who go to the drug stores for these little appliances and these little remedies; and unless it is an absolute necessity that this class of goods shall be taxed for the raising of the revenue required, it does seem to me that these considerations would demand that the tax upon drugs, both in the hands of wholesalers and retailers, should be eliminated from the bill, and I hope it will be done.

I am asked by the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] whether an estimate has been made by the committee. I do not know, and therefore I ask the committee to respond to the question: How much of revenue is it estimated will be realized from this tax, if an estimate has been made?

Mr. ALDRICH. There has been no estimate made from any official source, I think, but I have seen in a trade paper an estimate of $15,000,000.

Mr. BACON. The Senator, though, does not draw a distinction between the revenue which is to be derived from that which hereafter comes from the hands of the manufacturers and that which has already passed out of their hands and is in the hands of wholesale dealers and retail dealers. So far as the manufacturers are concerned, I do not ask, whether this particular scheme of stamp tax is carried out or not, that they be released from the tax, but I speak of goods in the hands of wholesalers and retailers. Has the Senator any information or estimate as to the amount of tax which would be lost by not taxing goods now in the hands of wholesale and retail dealers?

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the question of the Senator from Georgia to include the stocks in the hands of wholesale and retail dealers. I suppose he also intended to include the stocks in the hands of manufacturers. If it should be in their hands any time prior to the 1st of June, when the bill goes into effect—

Mr. BACON. Speaking for myself, I should be perfectly content if the stocks on hand with retail and wholesale dealers were relieved from this burden, if it should be required to be paid by the manufacturers whenever they sold goods hereafter.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think there would be any stock in the hands of the manufacturers if the change suggested by him were made?

Mr. BACON. I am unable to say.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is perfectly safe to say there would not be, I assume.

Mr. BACON. The Senator probably misunderstood me. I said that I would be willing that the stocks on hand and hereafter to be manufactured by manufacturers should be taxed; in other words, that the dealers—

Mr. ALDRICH. When the Senator says "hereafter" he means after the bill goes into effect?

Mr. BACON. Yes; whatever stock is on hand when the bill goes into effect, or whatever they manufacture hereafter. However, that is a matter of detail.

Mr. ALDRICH. That would be true in any event. I have not any doubt that it is the intention of the committee and of the Senate, and it will be the intention of Congress, to tax all goods that are manufactured after the law goes into effect. There is no suggestion that I know of that those shall be exempted.

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. As to the class of goods to which the Senator refers, I saw in a trade paper, with facilities for making estimates, that it would require $15,000,000 to pay the stamp taxes on proprietary articles now in the hands of manufacturers and wholesale and retail dealers.

Mr. BACON. That includes manufacturers. Has the Senator an estimate as to the stock on hand with the wholesale and retail dealers, exclusive of manufacturers?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator must understand as well as I do that if there is a tax on the one and not on the other there will be no stock, except in the hands of the wholesale and retail dealers; there will be no stock in the hands of the manufacturers. The stock will be in the possession of those people in whose hands it will be not taxable.

Mr. MANTLE. Mr. President, I do not think there can be very much question but that if the retroactive clause is to remain in the bill, as it relates to stocks on hand in drug stores, the conclusion arrived at by the committee to affix the stamps at the time the goods are sold is the very wisest solution that can be made of that matter. It renders it very easy and simple and plain of understanding and of operation.

The objection which has come to me in such communications as I have had on this subject seems to lie very largely against what they feel is a discrimination against that particular branch of business, by retaining the retroactive clause as it relates to them while taking it out as it relates to other branches of business; and I suggest that if there is good ground for this feeling among people engaged in this particular business, it is well worthy of our consideration. We can not afford very well, in levying these taxes, to subject ourselves to the criticism that we are discriminating against any particular branch of business. I do not know whether that feeling is warranted, but that is the statement which reaches me and that unquestionably is the feeling which many of these men entertain in respect to this matter.

There are some very good reasons, I think, why these retroactive features of the measure should be eliminated, if it is possible to do it, because I feel myself that this phase of the revenue measure is likely to prove the most unpopular, to be regarded as the most unjust, to be found the most onerous and difficult to carry into execution, of all the propositions advanced in the revenue bill. It has been suggested to me that if there is any thought of eliminating this provision as it relates to stocks of drugs, a date stamp might be used, that stocks on hand might have this date stamp affixed for the purpose of recognition, and in that manner there could, of course, be no defrauding of the Government. Goods sold could easily be required to have the date stamp or the revenue stamp upon them when sold.

I have not anything to say particularly upon the merits of the matter, but I thought in justice to those who have addressed themselves to me upon this subject, considering what seemed to me to be the justice of the objections urged, I ought to present them for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in common with other Senators I have had a deluge of letters on this subject. I want especially to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to a letter that came to me, I think, in yesterday's mail, and to which the Senator from Maine referred. It is a communication from the New England Retail Druggists' Union. They say they represent 3,000 druggists of New England, and I observe that a very prominent druggist in my own State is vice-president of the union. After calling attention to House bill No. 10100, respectfully protesting against that provision which would require the stamping of all proprietary goods in stock, they say:

We believe we should be required to stamp such goods only when they are sold.

So this union, representing 3,000 druggists, seems to have come to the conclusion that the provision the Senate has inserted is a just provision.

Mr. BACON. There can be no question about the fact that if the tax is to be imposed, however inconvenient it may be, that is the only way there can be any justice in it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The only further suggestion that these gentlemen make is the statement that in their opinion—

All trade-mark goods, in whatever line of trade or business, should be as amenable to taxation as the proprietary or trade-mark preparations for the sick, thus lightening the burden on all.

I am inclined to think that is a pretty good point, and that all trade-mark goods, if those goods are to be singled out because they are trade-mark or proprietary goods, should be dealt with in the same way.

Mr. President, my first inclination when I received these communications from personal friends was to give my vote, if I had an opportunity, against this retroactive legislation, but I confess my feeling has been considerably modified in view of the amendment the Senate has inserted, making the stamp tax apply only when the goods are actually sold to consumers. All things considered, considering the necessity there is for raising a large sum of money in a bill that at best is an unpopular bill, and must necessarily be so, because it deals with the subject of taxation, I am not quite sure that the Senate has not perhaps suggested a wise course, and one that ought to be supported; and yet I shall, if I have an opportunity to be in the Senate, listen with a great deal of interest to the discussion that will ensue to-morrow or at some near day on the question of retroactive taxation. I am inclined to think that the principle is not a very sound one and that the separating of one line of business from all others and imposing a tax upon it simply because it chances to be a manufacture of proprietary or trade-mark goods is not grounded in very good logic or upon the principles of equal and just taxation. That is the feeling I have about it, and yet, as I said, I am not prepared to say what my vote shall be on it. But I felt like calling the attention of the Senate to the statement of this union, representing 3,000 druggists, who seem to be pretty well satisfied with the bill as the Senate has amended it in that particular.

Mr. CLAY. I have on my desk more than fifty letters from druggists of Georgia protesting against this feature of the bill. That protest is made on two grounds. One is that the bill taxes all the drugs now on hand as well as those that will be purchased hereafter. That feature of the bill has been remedied. They also protest against it because the tax is too high. I hold in my hand a letter which sets forth fully and forcibly and clearly the reasons why they protest against the passage of this measure. I ask that the letter may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the letter will be inserted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

GEORGIA PHARMACEUTICAL ASSOCIATION,
Rome, Ga., May 9, 1898.

To the Finance Committee, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: Having carefully examined bill now pending, designated H. R. 10100, I take the liberty of addressing the committee to which it will be referred, calling attention to the burdensome features as it applies to retail druggists.

I do not think that the committee having this measure in charge desire or intend that the necessary revenues for war expenses shall fall heavily on any one class of dealers; but by referring to its provisions and taking into consideration the fact that it applies to fully 60 per cent of the sales made by retail druggists, it will be readily seen that it is unreasonable and burdensome, as the 30,000 retail druggists, representing one five-hundredth of the adult male population, will be required to contribute a sum sufficient to maintain an army of not less than 30,000 men.

Schedule B, pages 39, 40, and 41, requires adhesive stamps on medicines, proprietary articles and preparations. For and upon every packet, box, bottle, pot, or phial, or other inclosure containing any pills, powders, tinctures, troches, or lozenges, sirups, cordials, bitters, anodynes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, pastes, drops, waters, essences, spirits, oils, all preparations or compositions whatsoever, made and sold or removed for sale by any person or persons whatever, wherein the person making or preparing the same has, or claims to have, any private formula or occult secret or art for the making or preparing the same, or which are prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed for sale under letters patent, or which, if prepared by any formula published or unpublished, are held out or recommended to the public by the makers, vendors, or proprietors thereof as proprietary medicines, or proprietary articles or preparations, or as remedies or specifics for any disease, diseases, or affections whatever, affecting the human or animal body, as follows:

Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall not exceed, at the retail price or value, the sum of 10 cents, one-half of 1 cent.

Where each packet, etc., shall exceed the retail price or value of 10 cents, and not exceed the retail price or value of 25 cents, 1 cent.

Where each packet, etc., shall exceed the retail price or value of 25 cents, and not exceed the retail price or value of 50 cents, 2 cents.

Where each packet, etc., shall exceed the retail price or value of 50 cents, and not exceed the retail price or value of 75 cents, 3 cents.

Where each packet, etc., shall exceed the retail price or value of 75 cents, and not exceed the retail price or value of $1, 4 cents.

Where such packets, etc., shall exceed the retail price or value of $1, for each and every 50 cents or fractional part thereof over and above $1 as before mentioned, an additional 2 cents.

Page 41, beginning with line 3. Perfumery and cosmetics: For and upon every packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, containing any essence, extract, toilet water, cosmetic, vaseline and all like substances, hair oil, pomade, hair dressing, hair restorative, hair dye, tooth wash, dentifrice, tooth paste, aromatic cachous, or any similar article, by whatever name the same have been, now are, or may hereafter be called, known or distinguished; used or applied, or to be used or applied as perfumes or applications to the hair, mouth, or skin; made, prepared, and sold, or removed for consumption and sale in the United States; when such packet, box, etc., shall not exceed the retail price or value of 25 cents, 1 cent.

Continuing on page 42, the increase is the same as on medicines, proprietary articles, etc.

While the tax on medicines, etc., will prove onerous, this is even more so, from the fact that a great many articles under this classification are retailed at 5 cents each, while the tax required will be 1 cent, or 20 per cent of the retail price. The greater number retailed at 10 cents will be taxed 10 per cent of their retail value.

The tax on all classes of goods referred to in this communication will be paid by the retail dealer, and the time-worn phrase, "The consumer pays the tax," will not apply in this case. In support of this statement I submit the following resolution, adopted by a largely attended meeting of the manufacturers and proprietors held in New York on the 2d instant:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that proprietors should advance the price of their goods (to dealers) at least the cost of stamps required by the proposed law."

The following was also adopted: "It is the sense of this meeting that each proprietor immediately notify the jobbing trade of his proposed individual action in case of the stamp act going into effect."

Since this meeting adjourned I have seen numerous notices from proprietors, and all who make a definite statement of prices propose to advance about 50 per cent over and above cost of stamps. The retail price, being established and printed on almost every article of necessity, remains the same.

To a casual observer this bill would no doubt appear innocent and harmless. But when it is considered that 60 per cent of the goods we sell will be at an advanced cost of 12½ to 15 per cent, and allowing that each will sell three times as much per annum as stock would invoice, it can be readily seen that dividends on capital invested will be reduced more than 30 per cent, which necessitates a corresponding reduction in expenses or the retirement from business of a very large majority.

"Sec. 21. That any maker or manufacturer of any of the articles or commodities mentioned in Schedule B, as aforesaid, or any other person, who shall sell, send out, remove, or deliver any article or commodity manufactured as aforesaid, before the duty thereon shall have been fully paid by affixing thereon the proper stamp, as in this act provided, or who shall hide or conceal, or cause to be hidden or concealed, or who shall remove or convey away, or cause to be removed or conveyed away from or deposited in any place, any such articles or commodity, to evade the duty chargeable thereon, or any part thereof, shall be subject to a penalty of $100, together with the forfeiture of any such article or commodity."

Every druggist has in stock articles coming under Schedule B for which there is little or no demand, but continued in stock with the hope of being able to dispose of it at some future date, and if the above section becomes a law we will be required to affix stamps to each and every package in stock June 1, necessitating a considerable outlay, for which we will probably get no return whatever.

For this and other reasons it would be a great relief to so modify this bill that we would not be required to affix the stamps before said packets, etc., were sold or removed for sale. This would cause stamps to be promptly affixed to all staple and salable goods, while those for which there was little or no demand would not be stamped until sold.

It is doubtless true that this measure is based on the bill in force from 1886 to 1887, with due allowance for the increased population, but without taking into consideration the enormous increase in the sale and consumption of goods under this head. Having been actively in business during a portion of the time covered by the old war measure and to present time, I firmly believe that the bill now pending will produce a revenue of ten to twenty times the amount contemplated by the committee having the matter in charge.

Being fully convinced that this estimate is conservative and borne out by facts and figures, I write, as a representative of the Georgia Pharmaceutical Association, to petition your committee, in the event they consider it necessary to tax these articles, to have this bill amended to read "one-tenth of 1 cent on each packet, box, etc., not exceeding the retail price of 10 cents, and one-tenth of 1 cent for each multiple of 10 cents increase in retail price."

So amended, it would raise 20 to 25 per cent of total amount that would be received from the bill under consideration, and I am firmly persuaded that revenue derived would be very largely in excess of the most sanguine expectations of your committee.

In conclusion, I will ask your pardon for intruding upon your time, and assure you that I only write after being fully satisfied that the bill, if passed in its present shape, would prove onerous, and would require the druggist to pay into the Treasury a much larger sum than is contemplated or desired by its strongest advocates.

Very respectfully,

H. H. ABBINGTON, President.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the junior Senator from Texas [Mr.

CHILTON] whether the following amendment affecting druggists is now a part of the bill:

That all articles and preparations provided for in this schedule which are in the hands of manufacturers or of wholesale or retail dealers on the 1st day of June, 1898, shall be subject to the payment of the stamp taxes herein provided for, but it shall be deemed a compliance with this act as such articles on hand in the hands of wholesale or retail dealers as aforesaid who are not manufacturers to affix the proper adhesive tax stamp at the time the packet, box, bottle, pot, or phial, or other inclosure with its contents is sold at retail.

Mr. CHILTON. I will state to the Senator from Georgia that that provision has not yet been adopted.

Mr. CLAY. But it has been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir; and it is the intention that it shall be proposed in the Senate. It was intended to meet the complaints which were made by retail druggists that they should not be required to go over their stocks and stamp goods which might be sold now or a year hence, or which might not be sold at all, but that they should be allowed the privilege of stamping those goods at the time when they made a retail sale of them. That was the intention.

Mr. CLAY. I so understood when I made my remarks before.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read amendment No. 177.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 59, after line 2, to insert:

EXCISE TAXES ON PERSONS, FIRMS, COMPANIES, AND CORPORATIONS.

That from and after the passage of this act every person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing, or having the care or management of, any railroad, street railroad, sleeping car, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal boat, or other vessel, or any stage coach or other vehicle, except hacks or carriages not running on continuous routes, engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or freight for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, shall be subject to and pay a special annual excise tax equivalent to one-fourth of 1 per cent of the gross receipts from passengers, mails, shippers, or freighters of any such railroad, street railroad, sleeping car, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal boat, or other vessel, or such stage coach, or other vehicle: Provided, That the assessment hereby made shall not include any amount for the receipts for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails between the United States and any foreign port; but such tax shall be rated for the transportation of persons, freight, or mails from a port within the United States through a foreign territory to a port within the United States, and shall be assessed upon and collected from persons, firms, companies, or corporations within the United States receiving hire or pay for such transportation of persons, freight, or mails.

That any person, firm, company, or corporation carrying on or doing an express business shall be subject to and pay a special annual excise tax equivalent to one-fourth of 1 per cent on the gross amount of all the receipts from such express business.

That any person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing, or having the care or management of, any telegraphic or telephone line by which telegraphic or telephone dispatches or messages are received or transmitted shall be subject to and pay a special annual excise tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent on the gross amount of all receipts of such person, firm, company, or corporation for the transmission of dispatches and messages.

That every person, firm, company, or corporation who shall own or conduct or have the care and management of any business for life, fire, marine, or accident insurance, or for security and assurance of employers against losses by negligence or other misconduct of employees, shall pay a special annual excise tax equivalent to one-fourth of 1 per cent of the gross amount of all the receipts from premiums and assessments collected, and the duties by law accruing thereon; and a like tax shall be paid by the agent of any foreign person, firm, company, or corporation having an office in or doing business in the United States.

That every person, firm, company, or corporation carrying on or doing the business of furnishing gas or electric light, electric power, steam heat, or steam power, refining petroleum, or refining sugar shall be subject to and pay a special annual excise tax equivalent to one-fourth of 1 per cent of the gross amount of all receipts of such persons, firms, corporations, and companies in their respective business.

That every person, bank, association, company, or corporation engaged in the business of banking shall pay a special excise tax which shall be equal to one forty-eighth of 1 per cent each month upon the average amount of the deposits of money subject to payment by check or draft, or represented by certificate of deposit or otherwise, whether payable on demand or at some future day.

And a true and accurate return of the amount of deposit as aforesaid shall be made and rendered monthly by each of such banks, associations, corporations, companies, or persons to the collector of the district in which any such bank, association, corporation, or company may be located, or in which such person has his place of business. Such return shall be verified under oath by the person making the same, or in case of corporations, by the president or chief officer thereof. Any person failing or refusing to make return as aforesaid shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction, be fined in a sum not exceeding $500, or imprisoned for a term not exceeding six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. —. That every corporation doing business in the United States, whether chartered under the laws of the United States, or of any State or Territory of the United States, or any foreign country, shall pay a special annual excise tax; and said tax shall be the equivalent of one-fourth of 1 per cent of the whole amount of the gross receipts of such corporations derived from such business: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any corporation that is subjected to excise tax under section — of this act, nor to religious, educational, benevolent, eleemosynary, or cemetery corporations; municipal or other public corporations; fraternal beneficiary societies, orders, or associations operating upon the lodge system and providing for the payment of life, sick, accident, and other benefits to the members of such societies, orders, or associations, and dependents of such members; building and loan associations which make loans only to their shareholders; nor shall corporations which buy and sell raw or unmanufactured domestic agricultural products be required to pay any tax with respect to such dealings except as otherwise provided in Schedule A of this act.

SEC. —. That every person, firm, company, or corporation subject to a tax under sections — and — of this act shall, within twenty days after the end of each and every month, respectively, make a list or return in duplicate to the collector of the district, stating the gross amount of their receipts, respectively, for the month next preceding, which return shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of such person, firm, president, or chief officer in the manner and form to be prescribed from time to time by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and shall also pay to the collector the full amount of duties which have accrued on such receipts for the month aforesaid. And in case of neglect or refusal to make said lists or return for the space of ten days after such return should have been made as aforesaid, the collector shall proceed to estimate the amount received and the duties payable thereon, and shall add thereto 10 per cent; and for the purpose of making such assessment, or of ascertaining the correctness of such return, the books of any such person, firm, company, or corporation shall be subject to the inspection of the collector on his demand or request therefor. And in case of neglect or refusal to pay the duties, with the addition aforesaid, when the same have been ascertained, for the space of ten days after the same shall have become payable, the said person, firm, company, or corporation shall pay in addition 10 per cent on the amount of such duties or addition; and for any attempt knowingly to evade the payment of such duties the said person, firm, company, or corporation shall be liable to pay a penalty of $1,000 for every such attempt, to be recovered as provided in sections 722, 730, 919, and 3213 of the Revised Statutes.

When the Secretary had read the foregoing amendment to line 24 on page 63.

Mr. BACON. I ask that that section may go over for the present. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] I know desires to offer some amendments to it.

Mr. ALLISON. To which section of the amendment does the Senator refer?

Mr. CULLOM. The excise-tax section.

Mr. BACON. I do not desire to stop the reading of the amendment before it is read through, but I would be glad to have its consideration go over. The Senator from Maryland was obliged to leave the Chamber on account of indisposition.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that it was not expected that the amendment would be taken up for debate to-night. We are only making such progress as we can with a view of utilizing the time in reading the amendment, so that it will not have to be read to-morrow.

Mr. HAWLEY. I appeal to the Senator from Iowa. Can we not have an executive session now?

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will allow the amendment to be read through, and then I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut for an executive session.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment as given above.

Mr. MCENERY. I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 63, line 21, after the word "shareholders," insert:

Limited liability commercial partnerships, or corporations, and companies or corporations of limited liability conducting planting or farming business, or preparing for market products of the soil.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be printed and lie over until the amendment of the committee is again taken up.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 19, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CARRIERS IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE AND THEIR EMPLOYEES.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 4372, on the Speaker's table, with Senate amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, May 12, 1898.

Resolved, That the bill from the House of Representatives (H. R. 4372) entitled "An act concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees" do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the provisions of this act shall apply to any common carrier or carriers and their officers, agents, and employees, except masters of vessels and seamen, as defined in section 4612, Revised Statutes of the United States, engaged in the transportation of passengers or property wholly by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, for a continuous carriage or shipment, from one State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, to any other State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States.

"The term 'railroad' as used in this act shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation operating a railroad, whether owned or operated under a contract, agreement, or lease; and the term 'transportation' shall include all instrumentalities of shipment or carriage.

"The term 'employees' as used in this act shall include all persons actually engaged in any capacity in train operation or train service of any description, and notwithstanding that the cars upon or in which they are employed may be held and operated by the carrier under lease or other contract: Provided, however, That this act shall not be held to apply to employees of street railroads and shall apply only to employees engaged in railroad train service. In every such case the carrier shall be responsible for the acts and defaults of such employees in the same manner and to the same extent as if said cars were owned by it and said employees directly employed by it, and any provisions to the contrary of any such lease or other contract shall be binding only as between the parties thereto and shall not affect the obligations of said carrier either to the public or to the private parties concerned.

"SEC. 2. That whenever a controversy concerning wages, hours of labor, or conditions of employment shall arise between a carrier subject to this act and the employees of such carrier, seriously interrupting or threatening to interrupt the business of said carrier, the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Commissioner of Labor shall, upon the request of either party to the controversy, with all practicable expedition, put themselves in communication with the parties to such controversy, and shall use their best efforts, by mediation and conciliation, to amicably settle the same; and if such efforts shall be unsuccessful, shall at once endeavor to bring about an arbitration of said controversy in accordance with the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 3. That whenever a controversy shall arise between a carrier subject to this act and the employees of such carrier which can not be settled by mediation and conciliation in the manner provided in the preceding section, said controversy may be submitted to the arbitration of a board of three persons, who shall be chosen in the manner following: One shall be named by the carrier or employer directly interested; the other shall be named by the labor organization to which the employees directly interested belong, or, if they belong to more than one, by that one of them which specially represents employees of the same grade and class and engaged in services of the same nature as said employees so directly interested: Provided, however, That when a controversy involves and affects the interests of two or more classes and grades of employees belonging to different labor organizations, such arbitrator shall be agreed upon and designated by the concurrent action of all such labor organizations; and in cases where the majority of such employees are not members of any labor organization, said employees may by a majority vote select a committee of their own number, which committee shall have the right to select the arbitrator on behalf of said employees. The two thus chosen shall select the third commissioner of arbitration; but, in the event of their failure to name such arbitrator within five days after their first meeting, the third arbitrator shall be named by the commissioners named in the preceding section. A majority of said arbitrators shall be competent to make a valid and binding award under the provisions hereof. The submission shall be in writing, shall be signed by the employer and by the labor organization representing the employees, shall specify the time and place of meeting of said board of arbitration, shall state the questions to be decided, and shall contain appropriate provisions by which the respective parties shall stipulate, as follows:

"First. That the board of arbitration shall commence their hearings within ten days from the date of the appointment of the third arbitrator, and shall find and file their award, as provided in this section, within thirty days from the date of the appointment of the third arbitrator; and that pending the arbitration the status existing immediately prior to the dispute shall not be changed: Provided, That no employee shall be compelled to render personal service without his consent.

"Second. That the award and the papers and proceedings, including the testimony relating thereto certified under the hands of the arbitrators and which shall have the force and effect of a bill of exceptions, shall be filed in the clerk's office of the circuit court of the United States for the district wherein the controversy arises or the arbitration is entered into, and shall be final and conclusive upon both parties, unless set aside for error of law apparent on the record.

"Third. That the respective parties to the award will each faithfully execute the same, and that the same may be specifically enforced in equity so far as the powers of a court of equity permit: Provided, That no injunction or other legal process shall be issued which shall compel the performance by any laborer against his will of a contract for personal labor or service.

"Fourth. That employees dissatisfied with the award shall not by reason of such dissatisfaction quit the service of the employer before the expiration of three months from and after the making of such award without giving thirty days' notice in writing of their intention so to quit. Nor shall the employer dissatisfied with such award dismiss any employee or employees on account of such dissatisfaction before the expiration of three months from and after the making of such award without giving thirty days' notice in writing of his intention so to discharge.

"Fifth. That said award shall continue in force as between the parties thereto for the period of one year after the same shall go into practical operation, and no new arbitration upon the same subject between the same employer and the same class of employees shall be had until the expiration of said one year if the award is not set aside as provided in section 4. That as to individual employees not belonging to the labor organization or organizations which shall enter into the arbitration, the said arbitration and the award made therein shall not be binding, unless the said individual employees shall give assent in writing to become parties to said arbitration.

"Sec. 4. That the award being filed in the clerk's office of a circuit court of the United States, as hereinbefore provided, shall go into practical operation, and judgment shall be entered thereon accordingly at the expiration of ten days from such filing, unless within such ten days either party shall file exceptions thereto for matter of law apparent upon the record, in which case said award shall go into practical operation and judgment be entered accordingly when such exceptions shall have been finally disposed of either by said circuit court or on appeal therefrom.

"At the expiration of ten days from the decision of the circuit court upon exceptions taken to said award, as aforesaid, judgment shall be entered in accordance with said decision unless during said ten days either party shall appeal therefrom to the circuit court of appeals. In such case only such portion of the record shall be transmitted to the appellate court as is necessary to the proper understanding and consideration of the questions of law presented by said exceptions and to be decided.

"The determination of said circuit court of appeals upon said questions shall be final, and being certified by the clerk thereof to said circuit court, judgment pursuant thereto shall thereupon be entered by said circuit court.

"If exceptions to an award are finally sustained, judgment shall be entered setting aside the award. But in such case the parties may agree upon a judgment to be entered disposing of the subject-matter of the controversy, which judgment when entered shall have the same force and effect as judgment entered upon an award.

"Sec. 5. That for the purposes of this act the arbitrators herein provided for, or either of them, shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations, sign subpoenas, require the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of such books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents material to a just determination of the matters under investigation as may be ordered by the court; and may invoke the aid of the United States courts to compel witnesses to attend and testify and to produce such books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents to the same extent and under the same conditions and penalties as is provided for in the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and the amendments thereto.

"Sec. 6. That every agreement of arbitration under this act shall be acknowledged by the parties before a notary public or clerk of a district or circuit court of the United States, and when so acknowledged a copy of the same shall be transmitted to the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who shall file the same in the office of said commission.

"Any agreement of arbitration which shall be entered into conforming to this act, except that it shall be executed by employees individually instead of by a labor organization as their representative, shall, when duly acknowledged as herein provided, be transmitted to the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who shall cause a notice in writing to be served upon the arbitrators, fixing a time and place for a meeting of said board, which shall be within fifteen days from the execution of said agreement of arbitration: Provided, however, That the said Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall decline to call a meeting of arbitrators under such agreement unless it be shown to his satisfaction that the employees signing the submission represent or include a majority of all employees in the service of the same employer and of the same grade and class, and that an award pursuant to said submission can justly be regarded as binding upon all such employees.

"Sec. 7. That during the pendency of arbitration under this act it shall not be lawful for the employer, party to such arbitration, to discharge the employees, parties thereto, except for inefficiency, violation of law, or neglect of duty; nor for the organization representing such employees to order, nor for the employees to unite in, aid, or abet, strikes against said employer; nor, during a period of three months after an award under such an arbitration, for such employer to discharge any such employees, except for the causes aforesaid, without giving thirty days' written notice of an intent so to discharge; nor for any of such employees, during a like period, to quit the service of said employer without just cause, without giving to said employer thirty days' written notice of an intent so to do; nor for such organization representing such employees to order, counsel, or advise otherwise. Any violation of this section shall subject the offending party to liability for damages: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any employee, party to such arbitration, from reducing the number of its or his employees whenever in its or his judgment business necessities require such reduction.

"Sec. 8. That in every incorporation under the provisions of chapter 557 of the United States Statutes of 1885 and 1886 it must be provided in the articles of incorporation and in the constitution, rules, and by-laws that a member shall cease to be such by participating in or by instigating force or violence against persons or property during strikes, lockouts, or boycotts, or by seeking to prevent others from working through violence, threats, or intimidations. Members of such incorporations shall not be personally liable for the acts, debts, or obligations of the corporations, nor shall such corporations be liable for the acts of members or others in violation of law; and such corporations may appear by designated representatives before the board created by this act, or in any suits or proceedings for or against such corporations or their members in any of the Federal courts.

"Sec. 9. That whenever receivers appointed by Federal courts are in the possession and control of railroads, the employees upon such railroads shall have the right to be heard in such courts upon all questions affecting the terms and conditions of their employment, through the officers and representatives of their associations, whether incorporated or unincorporated, and no reduction of wages shall be made by such receivers without the authority of the court therefor upon notice to such employees, said notice to be not less than twenty days before the hearing upon the receivers' petition or application, and to be posted upon all customary bulletin boards along or upon the railway operated by such receiver or receivers.

"Sec. 10. That any employer subject to the provisions of this act and any officer, agent, or receiver of such employer who shall require any employee, or any person seeking employment, as a condition of such employment, to enter into an agreement, either written or verbal, not to become or remain a member of any labor corporation, association, or organization; or shall threaten any employee with loss of employment, or shall unjustly discriminate against any employee because of his membership in such a labor corporation, association, or organization; or who shall require any employee or any person seeking employment, as a condition of such employment, to enter into a contract whereby such employee or applicant for employment shall agree to contribute to any fund for charitable, social, or beneficial purposes; to release such employer from legal liability for any personal injury by reason of any benefit received from such fund beyond the proportion of the benefit arising from the employer's contribution to such fund; or who shall, after having discharged an employee, attempt or conspire to prevent such employee from obtaining employment, or who shall, after the quitting of an employee, attempt or conspire to prevent such employee from obtaining employment, is hereby declared to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction in the district in which such offense was committed, shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $1,000.

"Sec. 11. That each member of said board of arbitration shall receive a compensation of $10 per day for the time he is actually employed, and his traveling and other necessary expenses; and a sum of money sufficient to pay the same, together with the traveling and other necessary and proper expenses of any conciliation or arbitration had hereunder, not to exceed $10,000 in any one year, to be approved by the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, is hereby appropriated for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1898, and June 30, 1899, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"Sec. 12. That the act to create boards of arbitration or commission for settling controversies and differences between railroad corporations and other common carriers engaged in interstate or territorial transportation of property or persons and their employees, approved October 1, 1883, is hereby repealed.

Resolved, That the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the said bill and amendments.

Ordered, That Mr. KYLE, Mr. GEAR, and Mr. LINDSAY be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to state very briefly to the House the provisions that have been added to the bill by the Senate, and then I shall move to concur in the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that this is a new bill. As I understand, everything in the House bill is stricken out after the enacting clause.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is true. Originally there were two bills, identical in every respect, one introduced in the Senate and one in the House. The Senate took up its own bill and added some amendments, and then struck out of the House bill all after the enacting clause and inserted the Senate bill as amended.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then do I understand that this bill, in the nature of a substitute to the House bill, is in fact the House bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have just stated—

Mr. BLAND. I would like to have the gentleman from Ohio explain the differences between the two bills.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I propose to do so. Similar bills were introduced in the Senate and in the House. The House passed its bill and sent it to the Senate. The Senate took up its own bill, put certain amendments into it, then struck out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and put in the Senate bill with amendments as a substitute. So that the effect of it is to have the House bill with Senate amendments, and to those amendments I propose to call attention.

I may say in this connection that immediately after the passage of the bill by the Senate these amendments were submitted to the original friends of the bill through Mr. Moseley, who has been the promoter of the measure in a large part, and I have their answer, in which, while the railroad companies have suggested an important amendment which I declined to offer, all the other parties to the interests involved have agreed to these amendments. I will briefly state what the amendments are. The first one is on page 4 of the Senate bill, and provides that—

In cases where the majority of such employees are not members of any labor organization, said employees may, by a majority vote, select a committee of their own number, which committee shall have the right to select the arbitrator on behalf of said employees.

That is to say, where it is not a labor organization, but there is a certain number of laboring men who desire an arbitration, they may get together and elect a committee, and that committee shall have the same power and authority as a labor organization has under the general features of the bill. That was done so as not to exclude from the benefits of the law unorganized labor, but to put unorganized labor on an equal footing with organized labor.

Then comes the provision, which is totally unnecessary, but which was put in on the suggestion of some one who thought he did not see the same provision in the bill, and it reads this way:

That no employee shall be compelled to render personal service without his consent.

Of course everybody knows that that comes close to the line of absurdity, for there was nothing in the bill that was coercive in any direction, and it was wholly unnecessary; but I do not care to have a committee of conference on an unimportant declaration of a fact that existed before.

Mr. BRUCKER. To what sections does that refer?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The first subdivision of the stipulation of the arbitration is found on page 4 of the bill, and this provision is at the end of the first subdivision.

Now, here is a short amendment which I do think is important and valuable to all parties. In the second stipulation it is added that "the award and the papers and proceedings, including the testimony relating thereto"—now comes the amendment—"certified under the hands of the arbitrators and which shall have the force and effect of a bill of exceptions." That simply takes the record, and instead of having to make a new record, as a lawyer would understand, and have it certified in the form of a bill of exceptions, it takes the record of the hearing before the arbitrators and transmutes that into a record.

Now, here is another provision put in in the first stipulation which is totally unnecessary and need not have been put there. They strike out these words: "No person shall, however, be punished for his failure to comply with the award, as for contempt of court;" and they put this language in: "Provided, That no injunction or other legal process shall be issued which shall compel the performance by any laborer against his will of a contract for personal labor or service."

That was totally unnecessary, as the common law of employment, established in favor of laborers, and the plain stipulation of the bill itself are already effectual in that direction. But this provision was put in to gratify somebody's view, and I do not care to have a controversy about it.

Now, at the end of the fifth stipulation, on the sixth page, will be found this language:

That as to individual employees not belonging to the labor organization or organizations which shall enter into the arbitration, the said arbitration and the award made therein shall not be binding, unless the said individual employees shall give assent in writing to become parties to said arbitration.

It would seem very strange that in an act of legislation there should be a disclaimer of a purpose to bind anybody who was not a party to the proceeding; but lest somebody should think that when a certain number of an organized body of laborers had demanded an arbitration they would thereby bind their associates who did not join in the demand, this provision has been put in, making the bill absolutely clear of any coercive effect upon anybody but those seeking the arbitration.

That is all there is in these amendments.

Mr. BLAND. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. I am not as familiar with the bill as perhaps I ought to be, but I have understood it provides that where damages may be awarded to any employee on account of injuries received in the course of his employment, the amount of such damages is to be deducted from the amount which would be received from any mutual aid society or insurance company.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is nothing in the bill that has the slightest reference to that subject.

Mr. BLAND. Then I may have misunderstood.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is nothing that affects that question one way or the other.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. McEWAN. I should like to occupy the floor about five minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Speaker, I was informed that a motion to concur in the Senate amendments would be made this morning, and I was told that the effect, whether intentional or otherwise, would be that the bill would not go back to the Senate. I happen to know that if the bill should go back to the Senate it would be changed to a great degree, and certain Senators, having reflected further upon it, would vote against the bill. I know of no more vicious bill that can come before any legislative body at any time than the present bill. It will, in my judgment, entirely do away with all labor organizations. I believe that is the purpose of the bill. It has been drawn with a great deal of skill. It provides that railroad companies, after an alleged arbitration has been decided, shall not dismiss employees except for one of three causes.

The first is inefficiency; the second, violation of the law; and the third I have forgotten, as I merely made some hasty notes while the bill was being read and have not had opportunity to read it. What other reasons need be given for dismissal? These would be bases for any charge. The bill also provides that the railroad company may dismiss employees whether they have been engaged in strikes or otherwise, for the purpose of decreasing the number of employees, thus giving to the railroad company—not avowedly, but that will be the result—the power to dismiss men in case they go out on a strike, and giving to the workmen (no matter whether the bill pretends otherwise or not) no power whatever of redress.

Certainly a bill of this magnitude, instead of being brought up here to be disposed of on four or five minutes' debate, ought to be referred back to the committee, in order that it might come again before the House for careful and deliberate consideration. When I read the speeches of Senators ALLEN and TURNER on this subject, my views as to the inadvisability of passing the bill were confirmed. However, I want to say that the representatives of the Brotherhoods of Locomotive Engineers, of Firemen, of Conductors, and of Trainmen have asked me in writing not to oppose this bill.

I said, "I will not oppose it as strongly as it ought to be opposed, because you have asked me to refrain from opposing it; but I know," I said to this representative, "you will regret your action in this matter, for instead of favoring the bill you ought to do all you can to help me have it recommitment, even defeated." He said that those organizations were willing to take their chances. I think he and they have made a mistake. But what I now say shows where I stand in reference to this measure. It seems to me, as I have said, that a bill of this magnitude ought to be re-committed, that we ought to have an extended debate upon it. If anything ought to be considered in this country, it is the rights of the workmen, who constitute the majority of the people of the country, and who, in fact, are the country, because, being the majority, they are entitled to rule.

Mr. BLAND. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the labor organizations are in favor of this bill?

Mr. McEWAN. No; I said that the four railroad organizations that I named wanted it. I think they are mistaken in so desiring.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to put a question to the gentleman in charge of the bill. I find in section 2 this language:

Shall use their best efforts by mediation and conciliation to amicably settle the same, and if such efforts shall be unsuccessful shall at once endeavor to bring about an arbitration of said controversy in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Then, in section 3, it is provided that if neither the interposition of the Commissioner of Labor or of the Interstate Commerce Commission should bring about a conciliation, then an arbitration "may" be had. Why not use the word "shall" instead of "may"?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Georgia will examine the context, he will find that the word "may" practically has the same meaning as "shall" in that connection. And to amend the bill now by substituting the one word for the other would send it back to the Senate again, and would be in the nature of a delay which might possibly jeopardize its passage during this Congress.

I will say to the House that the bill in its present form originated with the only men in the world who are seriously affected by it. Step by step they have been watching this legislation, and they are now here asking the Congress of the United States to take this decided and necessary step toward an arbitration of the labor difficulties that from time to time must arise in this country.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand that to be entirely true. Mr. Speaker. But the question is whether we are to make the bill effective to meet the very object the gentleman suggests.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The bill does not undertake to provide compulsory arbitration.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Because the very first and essential element in a settlement of this character is that the arbitration shall be a mutual arrangement between the parties.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me a few minutes?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

I wish to say, first, to the gentleman from Georgia that this bill has been passed here by Congress after Congress. Both Houses passed it in the last Congress, and this Congress has also passed it, and it is believed to be potential in the interest of the laboring people of this country—the most important element in the population of the country.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But suppose the laborer refuses to accept the arbitration?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is not compulsory, and that ends it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then the bill is no improvement, as I understand it, over the present law. You can not compel arbitration, of course, under it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly not. Would the gentleman vote for a compulsory arbitration bill? Because if the gentleman from Georgia would vote for such a bill, he would place himself in the line of fire of the labor organizations, and you would need to have a search warrant to hold a funeral over his political remains in future. [Laughter.] That is one of the things—compulsory arbitration—that labor will not and ought not to submit to.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then why have anything of the kind in the bill? That is the point I am making.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My friend of course knows that no legislation of this character can be perfect in the very beginning. This is a start in the right direction; and hereafter such modifications and amendments as are necessary can be made to it.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Ohio now yield to me for a while?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts is not going to open up this whole question to debate now. Let us get a vote on it.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I think I can pour as much oil on the troubled waters as the gentleman from Ohio. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think I will demand the previous question.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman to give the Committee on Labor just ten minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I must insist upon the demand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GROSVENOR) there were—ayes 65, noes 75.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I ask unanimous consent to request the attention of the gentleman from Ohio for a moment.

I ask consent that debate on the Senate amendment be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Say twenty minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. Thirty minutes. Some gentlemen desire to be heard. I have no desire myself to occupy the time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition whatever to cut off any proper debate, or any debate that is practical and to the purpose, but this bill has been disposed of so often and it is so thoroughly understood that I do not want to have it defeated on a yeas-and-nays vote.

Mr. DOCKERY. No one desires to defeat the bill, as I understand.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am perfectly willing to yield ten minutes to any gentleman on the other side who desires to be heard on the question.

Mr. DOCKERY. That will be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I will give five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] if he desires to occupy the floor for that length of time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition that the motion for the previous question be considered as withdrawn, and that ten minutes be allowed on a side?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. And that the previous question then be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. And that the previous question then be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I do not believe there is a gentleman on this floor who would vote against this bill did he thoroughly understand it—understand its purpose and understand the extreme care with which the bill has been drawn. This is entering, in this country, upon a new type of legislation. Such legislation must not be mandatory to too great an extent at the beginning. It must be largely permissive. The purpose of the bill is to open the courts of this country to the adjustment of difficulties that arise between capital and labor, to provide for a method of determining controversies between wage earners and their employers, and in order that we may get an initiatory point, in order that we may have a beginning, in order that we may establish a precedent or create precedents, that the laboring man working with his hands shall have the same chance and opportunity before the courts that the great corporations have, a law of this kind is necessary.

The corporations have had laws for centuries and decisions of courts for centuries defining the rights of tangible property, which they can quote and which are their defense. While the individual laborer, as such, has not been brought within the purview of laws and courts up to the present time. This is an initiatory step. That is all there is of it, and the laboring people dare not enter upon mandatory provisions. On account of the mistakes which courts have made, by pushing precedents too far and not taking modern conditions into consideration, the experience of the laboring people has been such that they are not justified in permitting compulsory arbitration to be forced upon them. Every laboring man in the country affected by this bill asks for it. There are some laboring men not affected by it, who are afraid that even this bill goes too far.

Mr. GAINES. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question for information. Under what circumstances do the courts take hold of the matter?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Whenever any difficulty arises and the parties desire to have the court take hold of it. It provides courts of arbitration; that is the point of the thing. It is much like going into a court of equity.

Mr. GAINES. Does it provide that the contract may be enforced by imprisoning the parties who are refractory?

Mr. McEWAN. By contempt; yes.

Mr. GAINES. I am told it does and that it does not. What is the fact?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. There is an amendment here that cuts out the possibility of imprisonment of the laboring man for contempt for quitting work. In this bill the laboring man are put at every advantage and the corporations at every disadvantage, as far as it is safe to go.

Mr. GAINES. A gentleman who represents labor organizations said this morning to me that it does provide as I have suggested.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I want to say to the gentleman that there are always contentions among labor organizations, as there are between political parties. Labor organizations not affected by this bill are some of them opposing it, but not a man connected with a labor organization affected by this bill opposes it. They are all in favor of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Have any of them expressed a desire to have the bill passed?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Every single man of them.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question for information. We do not understand the status of this matter. I understand that the Senate struck out all after the enacting clause of our bill and presented a new bill. Is that so?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes; but the new bill is identical with our bill. Mr. GROSVENOR introduced the bill in the House and it was introduced in the Senate, the same identical bill; but having amended their bill in the Senate, they sent us their bill by way of a substitute, as a shorter way, but it is substantially our bill, which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] introduced.

Mr. GREENE. Is there any provision in this bill which gives the court authority, after having heard these matters, to render a judgment that the court can in any manner enforce?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Well, practically, against the corporations it can, and against the individual workingman it can not. That is the real fact.

Mr. GREENE. Do you believe that any court—

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I move that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GREENE. I simply want to ask—

Mr. GROSVENOR. The debate has been limited to twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] is recognized.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT].

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I am not rising in opposition to this bill. In the Fifty-fourth Congress a bill of this sort was passed by the House and sent over to the Senate, and the Senate changed it entirely. In the beginning of this session the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] introduced a bill covering the provisions of the Senate bill, as I understand it. We passed unanimously on the bill in the Committee on Labor, and that bill was passed by the House and went to the Senate, and they have changed it entirely, so that we do not understand what we are voting upon. I think we ought to refuse to concur in the Senate amendments, and let this bill go to a conference, so that these amendments can be examined to the satisfaction, at least, of the members of the Committee on Labor.

I will not go so far as to say that the bill ought to be recommended, but my contention is that it ought to go to a conference, so that these matters can be looked into and see what is the purport of these amendments added by the Senate. This is not the same bill as it passed the House. It is altogether different. While the members of the Committee on Labor were unanimously in favor of the bill as it came before the Committee on Labor and indorsed it, they do not indorse what is purported to be carried out in this bill with the Senate amendments attached.

They do not know what is in the bill. They do not know whether they indorse it or not; and as I understand it, the members of the organizations representing labor, as I have been informed, have already asked members of this House to oppose the bill in its present condition. I therefore hope the House will not concur in the Senate amendments, but will ask for a conference, so that the matter can be investigated and looked into. The representatives of labor indorsed the bill as it was before the Committee on Labor, but they do not indorse it as it is now.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman will permit me to ask him a question. Does he not know what these Senate amendments are?

Mr. TALBERT. I understand from representations made to members of this House that the bill has been changed so that we do not know what is in the bill. It is not stated here—the gentleman from Ohio may have stated it—but my contention is that we ought not to rush a thing of this kind through here in this hot haste. We have more time than money, I suppose, and let us look into the matter. This is not a war measure, not an emergency measure. We have licked the Spaniards once or twice, and we can lick them again, without this bill. I hope gentlemen will not impeach our patriotism and stand up here and refuse a little more time for an investigation in regard to this bill. I am in favor of the bill as it passed the Committee on Labor, and passed it unanimously. Now, let us have a little more time to look into it, and then, if it is all right, this House will pass it again unanimously.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman now answer a question?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly; if I can.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you not know that these organizations have had representatives here looking after this legislation now provided?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly; they favored the bill as it was reported by the House Committee on Labor, but they can not keep up with the changes that are made from one House to the other. Gentlemen representing a number of labor organizations have asked members to vote against this bill in its present shape. As I have already said, we do not want to vote blindly, but want to vote intelligently after we have had an opportunity to consider it, and I only ask that we be allowed to send the bill to a conference and not to recommit it, so that we can find out what is intended to be done by the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Speaker, so that there may be no misunderstanding with reference to the position that we upon this side of the Chamber occupy with reference to this bill, let me say that as this bill was reported from the Committee on Labor, and as it passed the House and went to the Senate, no member on this side raised any objection to it. Now, the bill comes back with certain amendments attached to it by the Senate. My understanding was, being a member of the Committee on Labor, that the bill as reported to the House by the Committee on Labor, and as it was passed, met the universal indorsement of the representatives of organized labor throughout the United States.

I want to say to the House that within the last forty-eight hours gentlemen who represent, not the organized railroad employees, but organized labor outside of railroads, in consultation with me made the statement that the amendments incorporated and adopted by the Senate materially alter and change the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me to say—

Mr. BRUCKER. I do not know whether that statement is true or not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me to say that these amendments were proposed by such gentlemen as Senators NELSON of Minnesota and ALLEN of Nebraska, all of them representing in the strongest sense the labor interests of the country?

Mr. BRUCKER. Now, that may be true; but as a matter of fact, I want to investigate the amendments myself. I am a member of the Committee on Labor of the House, and do not propose to vote for the Senate amendments until I have had an opportunity to investigate them. This is not an emergency measure, and we are not going to delay its passage. The friends of this bill as reported by the Committee on Labor and the friends of this bill as it passed the House simply ask that these amendments go to a committee of conference instead of being rushed through at this break-neck speed; and there is no reason for passing it in this hasty and unusual way. We only ask that the amendments passed by the Senate may be referred to a committee of conference, so that that committee can prepare and present an intelligent report stating the nature and effect of the amendments, so that we may know what we are doing and that no mistake may be made.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield half a minute to my colleague [Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the Senate amendments to this bill are being considered under one of the fundamental rules of procedure in this House; that is, in proportion to the importance of the measure the time is limited. We never pretend to discuss a measure of any importance. The Senate amendments have not been printed for our information. We do not know what they are, or whether the bill as it is reported back from the Senate is satisfactory to the men who have come here as the authorized agents of labor organizations to ask for the passage of a labor-arbitration bill. The discussion is limited probably because this bill is loaded, and the amendments ought to be voted down and sent to conference.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under the conflicting statements we have as to the opinion of the labor organizations upon this question, it would be difficult to say what they did want. The bill, however, has this merit in it: It is a voluntary bill; it can not be enforced without the consent of the labor organizations. I have not been able to investigate the bill so as to pass any opinion upon it, but I think it is the saving clause for these labor organizations that it is a voluntary measure. One trial, in my opinion, will satisfy them, and they never will try it again.

Mr. LINNEY. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me a question?

Mr. BLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. LINNEY. I understand you to say the bill is entirely voluntary. If the gentleman will examine section 4, he will find that it provides for a judgment on the award, and that can be enforced by execution.

Mr. BLAND. My understanding of it is that it never can be got into court without the consent of the labor organization.

Mr. LINNEY. No; no arbitration can ever get into court without the consent of the arbitrators.

Mr. BLAND. That is what I mean. Now, I hold here in my hand the card of a gentleman who represents the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and Locomotive Firemen, and they are in favor of it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. RHEA].

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Labor Committee, I see this danger in the amendment put upon the House bill by the Senate. Originally the House bill said that no employee should be fined as for contempt for refusal to abide by an award of the commission or court. That is stricken out and a clause inserted which says, "No injunction or other legal process shall be issued which shall compel the performance by any laborer against his will of a contract for personal labor or service," but it leaves him subject to all the processes of contempt the court may issue against him. It leaves it open to doubtful construction, to say the least of it. Yes; you gentlemen on the other side may smile and vote and vote and smile, as you always do when a serious proposition comes before the House. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] permit me, without taking it out of the gentleman's time? I ask unanimous consent that fifteen minutes on a side more time be given to this measure, for it is a very important measure, and gentlemen ought to understand it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that fifteen minutes more time on each side be allowed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOCKERY. I believe in the principle of voluntary arbitration and in the power of organized labor. Labor has achieved substantially all of its notable triumphs by organization. In the brief moments remaining to me, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that during the time I have had the honor to be a Representative on this floor, I have earnestly supported all measures looking to the arbitration of differences between employers and employees, have voted for all bills limiting the hours of labor, and for every other proposition reported by the Committee on Labor designed to uplift the arms of labor and bring happiness and contentment to this great body of our people. The bill under consideration comes back from the Senate substantially a new bill.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says the amendments to the House bill are in fact few, and he has stated them to the House. I have had no opportunity to read the amendments, no opportunity to read the bill as amended, because it has not yet been printed. I wish to say, however, that two representatives of labor organizations, Mr. E. A. Moseley, secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and Mr. W. F. Hynes, representing the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Order of Railway Conductors, the Order of Railroad Telegraphers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, have urged me to support this bill as amended by the Senate substitute.

I intend to vote for the bill. I shall do so on the statements of these gentlemen, representing the labor organizations, and the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in charge of the bill. I believe the gentleman from Ohio is a friend of labor, and he assures us that the only changes made by the Senate are the ones he has noted, and yet I wish we could have more time for consideration than the fifteen minutes secured by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

I would like time to thoroughly examine the bill, but the representatives of these laboring men urge us to accept the Senate amendments without delay; and the gentleman from Ohio adds his persuasive plea. I shall vote for the bill as amended; but still it seems to me that with no great volume of business pressing, with the agreement already effected that the House will adjourn until Monday, we might have time to print the bill and amendments and critically scrutinize the Senate propositions. I view this bill with some apprehension, because I have heretofore seen measures passed by this House, ostensibly in the interest of the people and of labor; but when they were put into operation, they were found to be hostile to their interests.

I trust this apprehension may be groundless. I know the gentlemen representing the labor organizations are sincere and the gentleman from Ohio is frank and honest. I accept the judgment of these gentlemen, and will vote for the bill as it comes from the Senate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems proper for me to yield the control of the additional fifteen minutes to some gentleman on the Labor Committee, and I will yield it to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT].

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] a question while he is on the floor?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If I can have the attention of the Chair. I have twenty minutes, as I understand?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has twenty minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. In the bill as passed by the House I find in section 7, page 5, the following language:

No person shall, however, be punished for his failure to comply with the award as for contempt of court.

Now, I understand from the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio that in the Senate amendments this provision of the bill has been stricken out, and in lieu thereof the Senate has substituted an amendment providing simply that no injunction shall be issued—

Mr. TAWNEY. "Or other legal process." The language covers everything.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is mistaken if he thinks the amendment narrows or impairs at all the provision of the House bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. The amendment provides that no injunction or other process shall be issued to compel the employee to continue his labor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The language of the Senate amendment is:

That no injunction or other legal process shall be issued which shall compel the performance by any laborer against his will of a contract for personal labor or service.

This provision was inserted at the instance of the friends of labor lest the provisions of the bill as passed by the House should be too narrow. They wanted it made broader, and it was put in at their suggestion.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the gentleman from Ohio, then, to say that this provision of the House bill was stricken out and the Senate amendment put in at the request of the labor organizations.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do say so; and in a moment I will show what the mover of the amendment had to say about it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not doubt the gentleman's statement.

Mr. TALBERT. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he has any assurance from the representatives of the labor organizations that they are satisfied with and indorse the Senate amendments?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have already said twice over, as loudly as my voice would permit, that these amendments have been sent to every one of these organizations, and that every one of them has indorsed them and asked that they be concurred in; and gentlemen representing those organizations are in the galleries of the House now, listening to find out whether the amendments are to be successful or not.

Mr. HANDY. If I can have the attention of the gentleman from Ohio for a moment, I wish to ask him whether the Senate amendments are in print, so that members may look at them?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have them here, and will furnish a copy to the gentleman from Delaware with great pleasure.

Mr. HANDY. I tried to get them at the Doorkeeper's desk and was not successful.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Delaware will find that my statement of them was exactly correct. They are all in the interest of labor and against corporations—every one of them.

Mr. HANDY. Does the gentleman refer to a manuscript copy of the amendments?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is a typewritten copy, which shows exactly what they are.

Mr. OTJEN. Will not the gentleman from Ohio explain the difference between the bill as now amended by the Senate and the bill as passed by the House?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have done so already. I have gone over the Senate amendments step by step very carefully. I could do so again, but it would consume a good deal of time.

Mr. OTJEN. I was not in the House at the early stage of this discussion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I shall wait now until gentlemen on the other side consume some of their time.

Mr. TALBERT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this time has been accorded me by the committee to express my views on the amendments. They are to some extent those I proposed here in the House. It will be recalled that when this bill was under consideration in the House I offered several amendments, contending at that time that the measure was obnoxious to many legitimate objections. It is true that many of the amendments which I offered at that time have been to some extent adopted in the bill.

I have very little hope and less confidence that the arbitration feature of this bill will prove an advantage to anybody. But I have some hope of and much reliance on the features of the bill which prevent corporations and employers from discharging or blacklisting their employees because they may be members of labor organizations. This provision may be effective. Therefore my support of this bill is rather in the line of the Merchant of Venice: "I do a little wrong that I may do a great good."

I think that the amendments which come to us from the Senate conform very largely to those amendments which I tendered in the House. That being so, I am inclined to waive my convictions on other points and support the amendments. In this respect I disagree with many of my friends on this side, who favor sending the bill to conference. I concur heartily with the expression of my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] that too many measures come into this House masked with favor or benefit to the poor, but carrying beneath the surface the iron hand of oppression exerted in behalf of power. But if this bill, coming from those who have given it consideration, carries with it no such secret persecutions, then we have to assent to the honest conclusions of those gentlemen who have given the matter calm investigation, and having faith in our fellow-members, abide by those conclusions.

I regret that time will not be afforded to discuss seriatim the provisions of the bill. As it now stands, I think it presents more good than evil; and purely upon that doctrine of ratio do I sustain it.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he will not now occupy some of his time?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think your side has more time than we have. You have time "to burn."

Mr. TALBERT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I have anything particular to say on this subject. [Laughter.]

I have been listening, Mr. Speaker, with a great deal of patience to hear something said with reference to the bill to throw some light upon its provisions, and which would enable me to determine what effect or value, if any, it possesses. But so far I have failed to hear a word that was convincing either for or against it, or in any manner elucidates its vague and mysterious sections. [Laughter.]

Now, I confess I do not know much about it myself, and suspect that there are others in my condition. I have read it as originally passed by the House. I have not read the amended bill that comes from the Senate, because I have not had the time; but as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], its author, says it is substantially the same, I accept that statement, and I only take this opportunity of saying that I am in favor of any bill or any legislation that will do anything to assist labor to gain its just and legitimate rights, rights so long in a great measure denied. If this bill shall prove even the harbinger of legislation that will secure such rights, and that can be enforced, then it will prove of some value to these long-oppressed people, as well as to preserve the rights of all our people affected by these common carriers, railroads.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. GREENE. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. I understand that this is the bill I hold in my hand that we are trying to pass. Suppose the gentleman takes the bill and shows to the House exactly what it is. I ask him to take this bill and allow the members of this body an opportunity to understand how it has been amended.

Mr. GREENE. Well, Mr. Speaker, in the five minutes accorded to me I could not, of course, go through all of these amendments. If time permitted, I would be pleased to do so for the benefit of both my friend and the House.

Mr. GAINES. Well, give it a slap, anyhow.

Mr. GREENE. I have an impression—a vague impression—that the bill does not amount to very much anyway. In fact, I do not think it really amounts to anything, either for or against labor. That, of course, is a matter of my own candid judgment, and I do not speak for other members. It does not strike me as a matter of consequence whether you pass the bill or reject it, as far as the interest of labor is concerned. The bill, in other words, is, in my judgment, a species of buncombe. It is a step taken, ostensibly, in the interest of labor, which can neither be benefited nor injured by it. It is easy to get such legislation through, but hard to get any that will really benefit our laboring people. What does this bill provide? It provides, for instance, for arbitration with the consent of all parties, and allows a judgment of a court to be rendered on the award which may be agreed upon by the arbitration board. Now, I would like some lawyer on this floor—and I see plenty of able ones right around me here—to tell me what kind of a judgment such a court could render.

A MEMBER. "Guilty." [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE. I want you to tell me what kind of a judgment your court will render on an arbitration when the award has been made by this board. Suppose an arbitration committee determines the question at issue, as to whether a corporation is paying to its employees too much or too little for their services, and the board decides that it is not paying enough. What manner of judgment could a court render under such circumstances?

Mr. LINNEY. The court will render the judgment that the award says ought to be rendered.

Mr. GREENE. Can a court render a judgment compelling the making of a future contract? Courts only determine existing rights as between litigants, and have no power to make new or different contracts than those made by the parties. Arbitrations take the place of a trial to determine existing rights, and, under proper forms and agreements, regulated by law, where such board has determined the existing rights of the parties to the arbitration, the court may render a judgment thereon as on a verdict; but in no case can new rights or obligations be created by such arbitration, and especially is this true when the parties have not agreed to be bound in that regard. This bill provides for no such an agreement. To illustrate: Suppose railway employees are working for the company at an agreed price of $100 per month, and because of changed conditions they conclude they ought to have $150 per month. The road refuses to pay it. Arbitration follows under this bill. The board finds that the employees ought to have $125 per month. The road has not agreed to be bound by said finding or award.

Now, what will be the judgment of the court? I suppose it would adjudge and decree that the road ought to pay $125 per month, but how will it enforce it? The absurdity appears at once, and the utter inefficiency of this bill becomes perfectly manifest. A bill of this kind, to be effective, ought to make provision by which parties to an arbitration should bind themselves in advance to be bound by the findings, and contain provisions by which the court could render an intelligent judgment, as well as to contain provisions for its enforcement. This would give labor some relief, but nothing short of it will.

Mr. LINNEY. No; but the court would render a judgment, and could render a judgment, on a contract already existing, if this had been submitted for arbitration.

Mr. GREENE. The gentleman is quite right as to existing contracts, but did you ever hear of a court rendering a judgment enforcing a contract which had never been entered into, or to compel a contract to be entered into in the future? If it did, how will the court enforce such a judgment under such circumstances? Why, you say, by execution and legal process. But what kind of execution and what kind of legal process would you establish to enforce contract not in existence, or to compel a contract to be entered into between parties where no contract had previously existed? You could not expect the court to undertake to compel the railroad company to make a contract with an employee or the employee with the road.

I am talking of this matter, Mr. Speaker, in a plain, common-sense way, as an ordinary member of this House, and of the provisions of this bill as they exist.

Mr. LINNEY. There never could be, by any possibility, such a condition of affairs as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. GREENE. In what respect?

Mr. LINNEY. No court could be required or expected or would undertake to compel parties to enter into a contract.

Mr. GREENE. I perfectly agree with the gentleman, and that is why I say this bill amounts to but little or nothing. The provision in the bill for arbitration and the settlement of disputes thereby, and the rendition of a judgment by the court on the award of the arbitration board, strikes me as being mere foolishness, child's play, boy's play—unworthy of the attention of this body.

And more than that, you will never get an intelligent court in this country to entertain jurisdiction of such a question for fifteen minutes, much less to render a judgment that could never be enforced under any possible circumstances.

Now, a court that would do that ought to be in a lunatic asylum. That is where it belongs. So the whole bill amounts to nothing, neither for labor nor against labor. Why not bring forward a bill that will really relieve labor, and not a mere sop like this? Now, I will vote for it—

Mr. HENRY of Indiana and others. Why?

Mr. GREENE. I will tell you why. For the same reason that gentlemen here have introduced the bill. I will be frank. Because it is as harmless as an infant. While it does no good, it is also powerless for harm, but may tend to agitate the question until something effectual will be done.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAHANY. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes, in order that he may explain his explanation. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE. I will explain. Republicans can vote for it because it in no way affects corporations, and Populists and Democrats can vote for it because it in no way hurts labor. It ought to be called a bill to propagate "obiter dicta."

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. MAHANY. I request that the gentleman be given time to illuminate his thoughts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Nebraska be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is time enough on that side without any extension. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. TALBERT. I understood the gentleman to say he wanted to use more of his time. Does the gentleman from Ohio want to use a portion of his time now?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am ready to call for a vote when the gentleman is through speaking.

Mr. TALBERT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. RHEA].

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, adverting to the few remarks which I offered a while ago, I wish to suggest one of the dangers which I apprehend in the amendment proposed by the Senate. The bill as offered originally and passed in this body, in section 3, on page 5, contained the following provision:

That the respective parties to the award will each faithfully execute the same, and that the same may be specifically enforced in equity so far as the powers of a court of equity permit; no person shall, however, be punished for his failure to comply with the award as for contempt of court.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if it is not a fact that when the bill was pending before the House on its final passage that particular paragraph of the bill was condemned on that side of the House for fear that an injunction would be used for some purpose in connection with this law, and whether speech after speech was not made upon a motion to strike out that provision, and whether the gentleman himself did not support that proposition at the time?

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Answering for myself, I say no.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How do you answer for the others?

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the powers of a court of equity to enforce its decrees? How may those powers be exercised or carried into effect? One of the commonest means is by a rule for contempt, citing those in contempt to appear before that court and purge themselves. Looking to that very existence of power in a court of equity, and to shield against its use by a court of equity, the Labor Committee added to that clause these words:

No person shall, however, be punished for a failure to comply with the award as for a contempt of court.

Now, the Senate has stricken out that clause, leaving the court, if nothing else would interfere with it by construction or otherwise, in full possession of all its power to rule for contempt any person who is in disobedience of any decree or order issued growing out of this award.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman read the substitute for that which is stricken out?

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. I was coming to that. In lieu of that clause the Senate have inserted the following:

Provided, That no injunction or other legal process shall be issued which shall compel the performance by any laborer against his will of a contract for personal labor or service.

But I submit to the candid judgment of every lawyer of this House that that clause does not rob a court of equity of its power to rule for contempt any person who disobeys the decree entered.

Mr. TAWNEY. Would not the words "or other legal process" cover that?

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. I hold that there is a distinct and well-defined difference between a rule for contempt and a legal process, as ordinarily understood.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is a lawyer. Will he, as a lawyer, state what the difference is?

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. The gentleman knows I have not time in five minutes to enter into all the legal arguments involved, but I state a proposition which, it seems to me, ought to commend itself even to the understanding of the gentleman from Ohio; that is, that there is a well-known difference between the powers and jurisdiction of a court of equity and a legal process, which is most usually restricted to such processes as are authorized by code or statute. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GREENE. May I ask the gentleman a question for information?

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GREENE. Does not the gentleman think the title of this bill ought to be changed and that it ought to be called a bill for the propagation of obituary dicta? [Laughter.]

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Oh, well, I have not time to enter into all that. But I ask even the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] if this clause down here does restrict a court of equity or deny it the right to bring into court as for contempt any employee who fails to comply with any award made or any decree entered, why he opposes this addition to this section here? Let the clause forbidding a person to be punished for contempt stand in addition to the clause inserted by the Senate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not oppose it. This amendment was made in the Senate.

Mr. TALBERT. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McEWAN].

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Speaker, my vote, if this bill be pressed to a final passage, will be governed by the same reasons that have been expressed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]; and yet I want to say this, as was said by Senator ALLEN in the Senate last Wednesday, "Let the laboring people, especially the railway men, whose friend I have always been, and by whom I have always stood through good as well as through evil report, know that they are being led into a trap by the passage of this bill, which means to them involuntary servitude," and who voted for this bill. Therefore, when the question comes up on the final vote, I shall vote for the passage of this bill; but I say to the railroad men who have asked me to vote for it, that "their blood be on their own heads."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TALBERT. May I be allowed one minute? I do not want to be understood as being opposed to the passage of the bill. My contention is that we should send it to a committee of conference, so as to be investigated before we take a final vote upon it, and I hope the motion to concur will be voted down. These Senate amendments, for all I know, may be against the interest of the laboring man instead of in his favor. I am and always have been in favor of any legislation which will lift up and benefit the laboring people of our country. These are my reasons for wanting this bill to go to conference, so as to find out these things. If you refuse this, why, I will vote for the bill on its final passage anyway.

Mr. GROSVENOR. One word. If this bill is what it is claimed to be, and if gentlemen have not assailed it for some purpose other than what appears, I can not ask those gentlemen to vote for it. It would be a violation, it seems to me, of their duty. But I can say very truthfully that it is the first time since I have had some little smattering knowledge of law that I ever heard anyone who claimed to be a lawyer say that a rule against an individual for contempt of court was not a process, a legal process. I give it up now; that is a new development. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the yeas and nays on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments; and on that the gentleman from Ohio asks the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 236, nays 5, answered "present" 10, not voting 114; as follows:

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

VISITORS TO WEST POINT, ANNAPOLIS, COLUMBIA HOSPITAL, AND DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUM.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the following appointments: Visitors to West Point, Mr. HULL of Iowa, Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania, and Mr. TATE of Georgia; Visitors to Annapolis, Mr. HILBORN of California, Mr. WANGER of Pennsylvania, and Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky; to the Columbia Hospital, Mr. LIVINGSTON of Georgia and Mr. BARROWS of Massachusetts; to the Columbia Deaf and Dumb Asylum, Mr. PAYNE of New York and Mr. SAYERS of Texas.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR GEORGE.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order fixing the eulogies upon the late Senator George for Saturday of this week be postponed until Wednesday of next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

JURISDICTION OF WILLS BY SUPREME COURT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up from the Speaker's table Senate bill 1910, an act conferring on the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction in the matter of wills. This bill was amended by the House, and the Senate refused concurrence, and I move that the House insist on its amendment and agree to a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act conferring on the supreme court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to take proof of the execution of wills affecting real estate, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the House insist and agree to a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. JENKINS, Mr. SHANNON, and Mr. RICHARDSON.

TAMPA BAY, FLORIDA.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 150, directing the Secretary of War to submit plans and estimates for the improvement of Tampa Bay, Florida, from Port Tampa to its mouth in the Gulf of Mexico.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to submit plans and estimates for the improvement of Tampa Bay, from Port Tampa to the mouth of the bay, in the Gulf of Mexico, so as to give a depth of water 30 feet deep at mean low water, 500 feet wide on the bar at the entrance of Tampa Bay, and 300 feet wide in the bay itself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOCKERY. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the bill ought to carry the usual provisions.

Mr. HOOKER. I am perfectly willing it should be amended so as to submit the views of the Department.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

And that the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to inform Congress of his views as to the advisability of the proposed improvement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOOKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a circular, without signature, without the imprint of the printer, claiming to be certified from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, circulated extensively in the State of Oregon, intended to affect the election which takes place there two weeks from next Monday. It purports to give a statement of my action and votes upon various measures before Congress, and citing the pages of the RECORD to substantiate the statement. There is not in this circular a single truth stated in a truthful way. Three-quarters of it is absolutely untrue and without foundation.

I find the circular has been forwarded under the authority of a committee that is composed wholly of members of the United States Senate and members of this House. It is forwarded under the authority of a committee that calls itself a Democratic Congressional committee. That committee is presided over by Senator WHITE as chairman, and its vice-chairman is Mr. OSBORNE, a member of this House. It has for its executive committee four Senators, eight Representatives, and one Delegate, and the chairman of this executive committee is the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, who is also the chairman of the national committee.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the committee that has circulated in my district an anonymous slander upon my personal and official record, and falsifying the records of this Congress. I desire briefly to call the attention of this House to some of these statements. I want to deny them here, where the records can be produced, and where my statements can be contradicted if they are not true.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the gentleman refer to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. OSBORNE]?

Mr. TONGUE. I did.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to call his attention to the fact that Mr. OSBORNE is not in his seat.

Mr. HANDY. If the gentleman from Oregon will permit me, I am a member of the executive committee. I am not familiar with the paper he is about to criticize, but I suggest that he have the paper read in full, so that to-morrow's RECORD may show what it is, and we can find out about it.

Mr. TONGUE. I have called the attention of the chairman of the committee to the circular, I have called the attention of the vice-chairman to the circular, I have been to the rooms of the committee from which it has been forwarded and called attention to its misstatements, and I have shown it to numerous members on that side of the House, and I have not shown it to one who has not denounced it as undignified, unbecoming, and largely untrue.

Mr. BRUCKER. In view of the fact that I am a member of the executive committee, I would—

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I insist that the gentleman in making his personal explanation ought not to be interrupted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But if the gentleman yields, I insist that it is perfectly proper.

Mr. TONGUE. Permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that while making this personal explanation I decline further interruption. At the close of my remarks I shall be glad to answer any questions. I simply hope that the members upon the executive committee will disavow any authorship of this slander and express their views on the propriety of the committee having circulated it.

The first charge is that during this entire session of Congress, covering about nine months, I have been absent or failed to respond to twenty-six roll calls. Now, I have not taken the pains to verify this statement. The charge is that I have failed to do my duty or have dodged my responsibility as a member. I want simply to say that every member of this House knows how these roll calls are sometimes made. I have a minute of one occasion when there were seven divisions and seven roll calls in one afternoon. It was at a time when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] was not desiring to do business, and he called for these divisions and roll calls when on four votes there were less than five members voting in the negative.

I have not missed an important session of this House nor a vote upon an important question when it was possible to be present, and believe my attendance will compare favorably with that of any member of the House.

Another charge is this:

True to his English instincts, he voted to allow pelagic sealing in the waters of the Pacific, thereby continuing the destruction of the seals.

So far as that matter is concerned, I want to say what every member of the House knows that under the decision of the Paris Tribunal citizens of every country on earth have the right to fish for seals in the open sea. The bill introduced in Congress undertook to preclude American citizens from enjoying the precise privileges enjoyed by the citizens of Canada; and one of the members of this committee in voting against this bill denounced it because of that fact; and most of the committee, I think, voted against it. I voted against excluding an American citizen from privileges enjoyed by all the world.

Another charge is:

He voted on January 11, 1898, to cut off debate and to railroad through a bill under consideration involving $21,562,425.65. (See RECORD, page 554.)

This is an absolute, unqualified misrepresentation. The bill referred to was a bill providing appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses. It was a bill involving very little controversy; yet having been introduced on the 14th of December, it was debated on every legislative day from that time until the 11th of January. At that time I voted at the opening of the session to terminate debate at 5 o'clock that evening. Yet a bill that was under discussion longer than any other bill that has been under discussion in this House this session I am charged with "railroading through." I am further charged with having—

Voted to make the producers and miners of gold in Oregon pay the cost of transportation to the mints from the assay offices, thereby putting an additional burden on an important industry of his State.

Permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that this charge is absolutely incorrect. There is no assay office in the State of Oregon. The miners are now compelled to send the products of their mines to the mint at San Francisco, or sometimes to the assay office in Idaho. I am anxious to have an assay office established in my State. I was inclined to think that the most effective way to do so was to vote to amend the law with respect to the payment for transporting bullion from the assay offices to the mint; and I did so vote for that purpose. But that measure does not lay a single additional burden upon a single miner in the State of Oregon.

I am also charged with having "voted in favor of an extravagant monument in the little town of Danville, Ill., involving half a million dollars of expense" [laughter], while there is nothing to show that I have attempted to do a like thing for the people of my district.

Permit me to say, with reference to that, Mr. Speaker, that the bill referred to as a measure for "an extravagant monument" provided for the completion of the construction of a soldiers' home at Danville, Ill. The construction of that home had been authorized by a previous law of Congress and an appropriation of $100,000 had been made for that purpose.

The Appropriations Committee unanimously reported in favor of an appropriation of $200,000 to carry on that work; and I voted against the motion to strike it out. Upon that motion 75 voted "aye," 123 "no," and 158 failed to vote; and only two of the members of this executive committee voted to strike it out. If that was "an extravagant monument," then those members of the executive committee who voted for it were failing to do their duty.

"An extravagant monument!" It will be, Mr. Speaker, when it is completed, a "monument" of the gratitude of this nation to its brave defenders in the hour of its great peril, and it is a "monument" for which I am proud to have had the privilege of recording my vote.

Again it says, on January 25, when the proposition to appropriate $288,000 for the Methodist Book Agents' Association was being considered and adopted by the House, "he dodged the question and did not vote." In extenuation or explanation of that, Mr. Speaker, it is only necessary for me to say, with reference to the little truth embodied in the statement, that when this matter was before the House and was being discussed, in my judgment unnecessarily, with a certainty that on a final vote the bill would be passed by a large majority, I did not stop to find out when the vote would be taken or to listen to the discussion, because there was no question as to what the vote of the House would be.

I had work to do, and have had work to do, outside of my duties in connection with the sessions of the House of Representatives. I have been necessarily compelled to go to the various Departments of the Government to look after matters there in which my constituents were interested. I may state, in passing, that I have secured over 100 pensions in my district, something like 40 new post-offices, and increased mail facilities in 20 different localities. I have visited the War Department many times to urge prosecution and completion of needed public improvements. It is important that a member who performs the duties he ought to perform for the benefit of his constituents should attend to these outside matters as well as to his duties in Congress.

It is further alleged that I voted in favor of "paying United States bonds in gold, thus adding to the profits of the bondholders and increasing the burdens of those engaged in agriculture and every other producing interest." This is not true in any sense of the word. There has never been a measure introduced here to pay United States bonds in gold. They are not paying them in gold to-day. Out of the payments during the last year by the Treasury of the United States, including every dollar paid upon United States bonds, amounting to something like $217,000,000 paid through the Treasury, the subtreasuries, and the clearing house in New York, less than $4,000,000 was paid in gold, and $37,000,000 of interest paid upon bonds was included in the sums thus paid. In these payments more than six dollars was paid in silver and silver certificates to every dollar in gold.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me to make a correction there?

Mr. TONGUE. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman desires to be correct?

Mr. TONGUE (continuing). And I am proud of my vote, Mr. Speaker, against the Teller resolution.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon has stated that he declined to be interrupted.

Mr. TONGUE. I have already said that after I have finished my statement I would be perfectly willing to yield to any interruption, but I must decline to be interrupted now.

I say, therefore, that that statement is absolutely and unqualifiedly without foundation.

It is further alleged that I "dodged the vote" when the bankruptcy bill was under consideration in the House, a bill "which would give relief to hundreds of debtors in his own State" and throughout the country. That is absolutely untrue also. The very page of the RECORD to which reference is made here contradicts the story and shows its falsity. I voted with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] to recommit the bill with instructions, and I also voted on the passage of the bill.

And this bill, if it was supposed to give so much relief, as it is alleged that it would, ought to have met at least the concurrence of the committee. It was passed almost exclusively by Republican votes, I believe, the Democrats and Populists as a rule voting against it. And if the relief to be afforded by the bill is so important, the committee itself was recreant to its duty, because only one member voted for it. The leader of both parties on that side of the House opposed it and voted against it upon its final passage.

I am charged with voting for a measure tending to injure and limit the circulation of country newspapers.

That is absolutely unfounded. I take some interest in the country newspapers, and it would certainly be the farthest from my motives to vote to injure them. I presume this alludes to the Loud bill. I voted for it. It was a good bill. I believed it was then; I believe so now. I believe the House made a mistake in not passing it.

So far as injury to country newspapers is concerned, it would have helped them instead of injuring them. These advertising sheets that are now published under the name of newspapers and sent out under the same rate of postage as legitimate newspapers, are destroying the advertising business of country newspapers. The cheap literature sent out through the mails from large cities at a loss to the Government is destroying the legitimate book business throughout other sections of the country.

Another charge:

He voted to authorize the merging of street railways in the District of Columbia, thus giving corporations the right and opportunity to increase their capital and still further water their stock.

This is absolutely untrue. I have voted for no bill that would authorize the watering of stock of any railroad or any street railroad. In the bill to which I presume reference is made, there was an amendment proposing to permit street railroads to lease other roads and to extend their construction upon the express condition that in increasing their capital it should not be watered and should not exceed the cost of purchase or the cost of construction.

Again—

On April 5, 1898, he voted to make a gift of $350,000 of the people's money to a shipbuilding firm. The shipbuilders of his own State are neglected.

Now, there are two statements in that. So far as the shipbuilders of my own State are concerned, I have besieged the Departments, almost making life burdensome to them, to insist that some portions of the contracts for shipbuilding should be given to Oregon firms, and it has been done, and the shipbuilders in my State do not complain. So far as making a gift is concerned, it was not a gift. It was an act of justice long delayed. It was an endeavor to repair an act done by the last Administration, which broke up and ruined one of the most enterprising of American citizens, drove him out of business, broke his heart, and shortened his life. This was an act of long-delayed justice.

Another charge:

On April 21, he voted to seat a Gold Democrat as a Representative and attempted to turn out of his seat a regular Democrat.

Citing the page of the RECORD, this is absolutely incorrect. I presume this refers to the case of Patterson vs. Carmack. The vote to which reference is made was a vote to take up the case. I did not vote to turn out Mr. CARMACK or to seat Mr. Patterson.

Again:

On April 28 he voted to allow railroad companies in the Indian Territory to merge and to lease their lines, thus giving railroad companies in that section an opportunity to increase and water their capital stock, and add to the burdens of those who are compelled to use the railroads in marketing their agricultural products.

That is not correct. On April 28, 1898, there was no bill of that kind nor anything near it under consideration. Some ten days before there had been a bill passed regarding railroads in the Indian Territory. It made no provision whatever for an increase of stock. It was reported unanimously by the Indian Affairs Committee, Democrats and Republicans alike, and as amended it was finally passed unanimously, and no one objected.

But, Mr. Speaker, about the worst and the most aggravating charge is that I voted against taking any action in the Cuban matter, and the page of the RECORD is cited. On that page I voted for the resolution authorizing the President to put an end to the war in Cuba and to establish a free and independent government there. There were 19 votes against it. Three of those were Republicans and one of those voting "no" was one of the gentlemen on this executive committee that makes this incorrect charge against me.

There are several claims that I voted against the recognition of Cuba. It is difficult to tell what they mean. I voted against the proposition to recognize the independence of the Republic of Cuba. I voted against the policy that would send us into the most righteous war of the century with a lie upon our lips. I voted against a policy of declaring to the civilized world that that Republic of Cuba was independent and was in the exercise of sovereignty when there was not a word of truth in it. I voted against the policy that would contradict and be inconsistent with the very action that we took.

I have voted in support of the policy of intervention in Cuba that would eventually make Cuba free and independent; and I voted for a policy, Mr. Speaker, that would result in driving from the American Continent as well as from the Asiatic Continent, from the land and the sea, the most cruel, most corrupt, and most tyrannical Government that exists to-day. I voted in favor of a policy that will enable us to write one of the most glorious pages of American history and inscribe upon it the victory of Manila; that will add to the long list of American heroes who will fire the hearts of American youth and will be an inspiration and example—the name of George Dewey.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine himself to the charges made against him.

Mr. TONGUE. Now, I want simply to say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I regret, and I think every member upon both sides of this House will regret, that a committee composed as this is, having for its chairman and members distinguished Senators and members of this House, have so far forgotten the proprieties of their situation, their duties, and their own dignity as to countenance and support under their authority the publication of an anonymous attack upon the private or public record of any member of this House. It is possible, as one of the gentlemen has said, that he knows nothing about it.

I simply want to call their attention to the fact, and to say that through that committee and upon the strength of the reputation and standing of that committee this circular has been published in nearly every Democratic and Populist paper in my district.

Mr. HANDY. I wish, as the gentleman is calling attention to this committee and this anonymous circular, to ask the gentleman, in order that he may call our attention to it and in order that we may know its length and breadth, that he will send the document to the Clerk's desk and let us hear it all read together.

Mr. TONGUE. I will send it to the gentleman, and he can have a copy.

Mr. HANDY. I would like to have it read at the Clerk's desk. As the gentleman has read parts of it as samples, I would like to have it all read.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that it can not be read at the Clerk's desk. It is not entitled to that privilege. The gentleman, of course, can furnish the gentleman from Delaware and other members of this committee with this circular, but so far as it being read and appearing in the RECORD is concerned, I shall object.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

A MEMBER. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HANDY. The situation is this: The gentleman from Oregon has produced a paper which he alleges has been issued by a committee of which I am a member. I want to know whether it would be in order for me to take the floor as a matter of personal privilege—he says he will furnish me the paper—and from my place read that paper as a matter of information to myself and to the House as to what this specific charge is?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it could not be submitted for that purpose; but if the gentleman reads it as a matter of privilege, the Chair will pass upon it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, has not any member the right to have any paper that he is discussing read at the Clerk's desk?

The SPEAKER. If the member has the floor and it is a subject proper for discussion. When a gentleman has asked recognition for that purpose, and has proceeded, the Chair has endeavored to confine the gentleman strictly to the matter before the House. The gentleman is very well aware that the present occupant of the chair does not encourage any such matters any more than he can help.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I do not understand that any objection has been made to the reading of the paper. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that it can not be read when objection is made, but otherwise it can be read.

The SPEAKER. A point of order under those circumstances would be in the nature of an objection.

Mr. HANDY. I ask unanimous consent—

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a privileged motion.

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman permit me a moment? Will the gentleman permit me to ask—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York rises to present a privileged motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York states that he rises to a privileged question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I rose to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does it relate to the matter called up by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It relates to the other matter.

WASHINGTON IMPROVEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT COMPANY.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its amendments to the Senate bill 4108, on the Speaker's table, and agree to the conference requested.

Mr. BAILEY. A parliamentary inquiry. The Clerk has not read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4108) granting the Washington Improvement and Development Company a right of way through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York move that the House further insist and agree to a conference?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do, Mr. Speaker.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. FISCHER, and Mr. LEWIS of Georgia.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now adjourn. The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAILEY) there were—ayes 92, noes 71.

Mr. BAILEY. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 96, answered "present" 8, not voting 133; as follows:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEWART. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1243) for the relief of Lincoln W. Tibbetts, to report it adversely. I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6460) for the relief of Galen C. Greene, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3277) to authorize the appointment of a military storekeeper in the Army, reported it without amendment.

AUXILIARY NAVAL FORCE.

Mr. HALE. I report back favorably from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments the joint resolution (H. Res. 257) providing for the organization and enrollment of the United States auxiliary naval force for coast defense. I ask for its present consideration, as it is very important that the joint resolution shall be passed at once.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, in section 1, line 3, after the word "force," to strike out the words "for coast defense;" and in line 5, after the word "necessary," to insert the words "not exceeding 3,000 enlisted men;" so as to make the section read:

That a United States auxiliary naval force is hereby authorized to be established, to be enrolled in such numbers as the President may deem necessary, not exceeding 3,000 enlisted men, for the exigencies of the present war with Spain, and to serve for a period of one year or less, and shall be disbanded by the President at the conclusion of the war.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, line 10, after the word "Navy," to strike out the words "and said force shall constitute the inner line of defense;" and in line 11, before the word "million," to strike out "four" and insert "three;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That the officers, warrant officers, petty officers, and enlisted men and boys of the United States auxiliary naval force thus created shall be paid from the appropriation "Pay of the Navy;" and the sum of $3,000,000, or so much thereof as may be required, is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase or hire of vessels necessary for the purposes of this resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution providing for the organization and enrollment of the United States auxiliary naval force."

Mr. HALE. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a memorandum touching the measure which has just been passed, which is very valuable as giving the facts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the order is made.

The memorandum referred to is as follows:

Memorandum in regard to House resolution 257, "providing for the organization and enrollment of the United States auxiliary naval force in coast defense."

It is hoped that section 6 of the joint resolution will pass the Senate in its present form. This section will enable the Navy Department to at once avail itself of the Naval Militia. There are in this force at the present time about 5,000 men under waiting orders. These men have been trained and instructed for the purpose of serving in the coast defense under plans prepared by the Department about three years ago, and they are armed, uniformed, and fully equipped with hammocks, blankets, mess gear, signal outfit, and everything that is necessary to enable them to go at once into active service. The men in the organization on the seacoasts have an intimate knowledge of the local waters, that will be of great service and advantage in coast defense. They have been instructed with special reference to the service contemplated by the joint resolution. The Department has stated in the reports of its inspecting officers and boards appointed to investigate the proficiency of the Naval Militia that a large percentage of the men are thoroughly well prepared for their duties.

Under the terms of section 6, the Department can muster in the coast defense in whole "or any part of the organization in the Naval Militia of any State." No organization or individual not fully qualified can therefore be imposed upon it. It has the option of selecting these organizations or parts thereof that it knows are fully competent and thoroughly equipped.

In several of the States the Naval Militia has already been mobilized and the informal consent of the governors of these States has been obtained, and in some instances already the voluntary service of the Naval Militia has been formally tendered. It is a fact easily demonstrated and generally acknowledged by experts that the best work can be gotten out of men if they are kept under their own officers. The Department under this section can impose such examinations as it deems best before issuing commissions, but for the most part the qualifications of the various officers in the Naval Militia are thoroughly well known and are on file in the records of the Department, and in many instances these men are ex-officers of the Navy. This section also reserves to the Department the power of appointing and disarming (reducing to the ranks) petty officers of the militia. The Department can therefore select such organizations or parts of organizations that are best fitted for the work, and satisfy itself of the proficiency of the officers or petty officers so as to commission, arm, and equip them accordingly, and it can avoid the large expense of uniforming, arming, and equipping an equal number of men.

Although the Naval Militia are best fitted for work in the various branches of the coast-defense service, such as scouting, patrolling, signaling, carrying dispatches, and transporting men, ammunition, and stores, and assisting in the general work of harbor defense, when mustered into the United States service they are, if the emergency arises, available anywhere, and although it would be wasting their special knowledge and training, they can be put in fighting ships, as they have made excellent gunnery records in their practice work. There is no legal restriction upon their being ordered to any duty at any place. (See High Smith vs. Usary, 25 Texas, 108.)

(They should have the same pay and right of pension as men in the regular service of the Navy. The sacrifices they personally make to serve are in many instances much greater than those made by any class of men entering the Navy. Their service, such as patrolling the fields of submarine mines, etc., is as hazardous as any attempted in the Navy with the exception of actual fighting, and they should receive the same treatment as the National Guard regiments which come into the Volunteer Army.)

Men from the Naval Militia have already left their State organizations and enlisted in the Navy together with their officers in sufficient numbers to man U. S. S. Yankee, Prairie, Dixie, Yosemite, Badger, Resolute, and other vessels, as well as the single-turret monitors that have been put in commission for harbor defense. The men from this service are also manning the coast-signal stations, thirty-four in number, from the most easterly point of Maine to the western coast of Texas. Some of their officers are doing bureau work in the Department, and the Department deems it of the highest importance to encourage and develop this Naval Militia force that has been so readily and economically available.

The passage of this resolution will entirely do away with the hesitation, questioning, and friction that has attended the securing of the service of some of these organizations heretofore.

Weight can also be given to the fact that the Naval Militia is an excellent recruiting factor, and is an elastic body from which the Department can draw from time to time for additional men at no expense to the Government; that is to say, it reaches the class of men who are not applicants for enlistment in the Navy and who, in a war of the present character, do not feel called upon to enter the regular service. Local pride, however, and the confidence that comes from a thorough knowledge of local waters, leads them to enter the State service, and then esprit de corps prompts them to enter the national service. The Naval Militia is therefore actually performing in this war the function which properly belongs to the National Naval Reserve, which should be organized later. The section in question has been drawn after careful consideration of the situation, and has been accepted by the Naval Militia through the president of the Association of Naval Militias of the United States.

The men in the Naval Militia who are still awaiting orders can be at once put at the disposition of the officer in charge of the coast defense. These will include organizations and officers in Massachusetts, Maine, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, California, and an organization is also being formed in New Hampshire.

H. L. SATTERLEE,
Captain Naval Militia, New York.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 19, 1898.

STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. McMILLAN on the 4th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer to report the hearings before that committee, the stenographer to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE AND ST. PAUL RAILWAY.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 168) to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to refund and return to the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company $15,835.76, in accordance with the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, dated March 3, 1898, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. GORMAN. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to know what committee reports the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TELLER. Then I presume it has been considered. It is difficult to determine from the reading of the long preamble just what the facts are.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will state the facts, if the Senator from Colorado desires.

Mr. TELLER. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will briefly state the facts.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Some years ago the Milwaukee road surveyed a line from the Missouri River to the Black Hills across the Sioux Reservation, and they made an agreement with the chiefs and headmen for a right of way for one section of land on the Missouri River. The road was never built. The Indians afterwards ceded the land to the Government and it has now been disposed of, the company receiving no consideration for the money whatever. The section of land was taken up and is a town site.

Mr. TELLER. Was the money paid into the Treasury?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The money was paid into the Treasury, and, although the Secretary of the Interior ordered it to be refunded, when he sent up his recommendation to the Treasury Department he was informed that the Department could not return it without an act of Congress.

Mr. TELLER. And this is simply to return the money?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is simply to return the money which the railway company have paid and for which they have received no consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

HARBOR OF SABINE PASS.

Mr. PASCO. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 195) calling upon the Secretary of War for information concerning the port of Sabine Pass, to report it favorably without amendment. It is a mere application for information, and has passed the House of Representatives. I ask that it be now considered.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to furnish Congress as soon as possible all information and copies of such reports as he may have relative to any enterprise or construction, in the way of a ship canal or otherwise, known to him to be in process of completion in or about the harbor of Sabine Pass, and as to whether any plans or estimates have been submitted to and approved by him or the Department of Engineers for any such enterprise or construction; and whether, in the opinion of the United States Engineer Department, there is any possibility of any such enterprise or construction obstructing or lessening the depth of the harbor of Sabine Pass.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 4631) granting an increase of pension to Sarah A. Core; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4632) to amend section 2757 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the Revenue-Cutter Service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 4633) for the relief of Thomas E. Streeter, of Allegan, Mich.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MASON introduced a bill (S. 4634) granting a pension to Turner J. Bowling; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4635) granting a pension to John B. Boggs, Olney, Ill.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McBRIDE introduced a bill (S. 4636) granting a pension to Vincent de Frietas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 4637) relating to quarantine; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BACON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 171) for the relief of Ex-Cadet Midshipman Thomas H. Gignilliat; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO WAR REVENUE BILL.

Mr. PLATT of New York submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

WAR REVENUE BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the revenue bill, House bill 10100.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 64, beginning at line 7, the Committee on Finance report to strike out the following:

SEC. 25. That every person, firm, or corporation who shall have made any contract prior to the passage of this act, and without other provision therein for the payment of taxes imposed by law enacted subsequent thereto, upon articles to be delivered under such contract, is hereby authorized and empowered to add to the price thereof so much money as will be equivalent to the tax imposed on said articles by this act, and not previously paid by the vendee, and shall be entitled by virtue hereof to be paid, and to sue for and recover, the same accordingly. And in all cases of articles manufactured or produced, in whole or in part, upon commission, or where the material is furnished by one party and manufactured by another, if the manufacturer shall be required to pay under this act the tax hereby imposed, such person or persons so paying the same shall be entitled to collect the amount thereof of the owner or owners, and shall have a lien for the amount thus paid upon the produced or manufactured goods.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill in regard to this amendment. The provision, it seems to me, as it comes from the House, is a very wise one. By the method of transacting business now pursued the vast majority of the business of the country in manufactured goods is done by contracts for future delivery, the bulk for one year hence, and they are made, of course, in immense numbers. Some firms have brought to my attention the details of their business, which it is not necessary or proper to put into the RECORD, but they show that this tax, added to the price of the sales heretofore made, will be very embarrassing. We have, for instance, in the city of Baltimore some 4,000 corporations, all of which have been formed within the last ten years, having taken the place of firms, and they are corporations with small capital. The average capital is not over $15,000. They were put into the form of corporations so as to keep the business within the family or within the members of the firm. There are some advantages under the laws of the States, and that is one of the reasons why the small corporations were formed.

Mr. SPOONER. And to prevent dissolution of partnership in case of death.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; it has that advantage also. In case of death it prevents the dissolution of the partnership. I think it is absolutely just that under this extraordinary war measure which we are passing they shall have the right simply to add the tax to the price of the goods already contracted to be delivered. Unless there is some very strong reason which I am not advised of, I trust the committee will not insist, at all events, upon the adoption of this amendment, but will permit the House provision to stand in the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I think I can say a word to the Senator from Maryland on the subject of the amendment that will be entirely satisfactory to him.

The House bill as it came to the Senate had in it this section 25, which the committee has stricken out. It is a reproduction of the section in the old law. The effect of that section in the old law was countless suits all over the country upon questions arising under it, almost invariably ending in a compromise between the buyer and the seller.

The section as it came from the House is inherently vicious in this respect: Suppose a merchant has a thousand dollars ready to meet a contract which he has made for goods, having contracted, we will say, last March for goods to be delivered in September, as is often the case. When his contract is to be met and the goods to be shipped, he finds himself confronted with a bill for fifteen hundred dollars, the tax having gone upon those goods, and he must meet a bill for $500 beyond his means and beyond his credit. This is an attempt by law to say that debtor must pay that amount, whether he will or not.

Mr. President, if it is a matter which needs legislation there is but one fair provision to be inserted into such a section, if it should stand, and that would be, if the consignor or seller of the goods shall seek to enforce this contract, then the buyer of the goods may at his option declare the contract canceled. Otherwise you would destroy the credit and the ability to buy on the part of small dealers.

But, Mr. President, there is another and a better construction, it seems to me, to be put upon the transaction. If the right exists at law for the seller of goods to collect in addition to the contract price the tax which the law has subsequently imposed, then it needs no legislation. If he has not that right, then it had better rest between the parties to determine the question for themselves.

But it is not right, and it is not fair, and it is not equitable for Congress to interpose and lay down a rigid law that the seller of goods shall have the right to collect from the purchaser who has purchased under a contract before the tax was imposed the additional tax levied. It is a matter that had better rest between the parties. The buyers and sellers in this country meet upon friendly terms. One sale does not consummate the relation between the buyer and the seller; it extends to a variety and to an infinite number of transactions; and men, if they are not hampered by legislation, meet and face those propositions upon some equitable basis. If we let it alone, as this tax has for war purposes been imposed upon these goods, then the seller is to meet the buyer in some fair spirit and come to an understanding outside the law.

In the committee the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] who sits on the left of the Senator from Maryland explained to us at some length from his own experience a great number of causes that arose under a similar provision in the old law, which always worked inequitably, and which were almost invariably settled out of court by an agreement between the parties. For that reason it seemed to us wisest that the matter should not rest on legislation, but that the parties should be relegated to their rights at law.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

Mr. WOLCOTT. With pleasure.

Mr. ALLEN. What power have we to legislate to increase the price of goods and change the terms of a contract already made?

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator raises a very important constitutional question which nobody is better able to answer than himself.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it not quite apparent that the courts will not enforce a law of that kind?

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator has had also fully as much experience in the courts as the rest of us.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee striking out section 25, on page 64. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President—

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to offer an amendment, if the Senator from Rhode Island will allow it, on page 62.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is not now in order, I think.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that the amendments of the committee are to be first considered under the rule, and the Senator from New Jersey will please withhold his amendment.

Mr. SEWELL. I thought amendments were being offered and acted upon.

Mr. ALDRICH. From the committee, I think.

Mr. SPOONER. And amendments to amendments of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Amendment No. 177 was read last night, and no action was taken upon it.

Mr. ALDRICH. On page 36, the amendment after line 3 was passed over yesterday by my suggestion. I now offer the amendment of which I then gave notice, to take the place of the committee amendment. On page 36, after line 3, I propose to insert what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 3, page 36, the committee amendment down to and including line 5, on page 37, is withdrawn, and the following is offered in lieu thereof:

Upon each sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell any products or merchandise at any exchange, or board of trade, either for present or future delivery, for each $100 in value of said sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell, 1 cent, and for each additional $100 or fractional part thereof in excess of $100, 1 cent: Provided, That on every sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell as aforesaid there shall be made and delivered by the seller to the buyer a bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, to which there shall be affixed a lawful stamp or stamps in value equal to the amount of the tax on such sale. And every such bill, memorandum, or other evidence of sale or agreement to sell shall show the date thereof, the name of the seller, the amount of the sale, and the matter or thing to which it refers; and any person or persons liable to pay the tax as herein provided, or anyone who acts in the matter as agent or broker for such person or persons, who shall make any such sale, or agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, or who shall, in pursuance of any such sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, deliver any such products or merchandise without a bill, memorandum, or other evidence thereof as herein required, or who shall deliver such bill, memorandum, or other evidence of sale, or agreement to sell, without having the proper stamps affixed thereto, with intent to evade the foregoing provisions, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not less than five hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. BACON. I think, upon reading the amendment submitted by the Senator from Rhode Island, the change proposed in it covers the point suggested by me yesterday.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was intended to do so.

Mr. BACON. I think it does fully.

I desire to make one other suggestion, with the permission of the Senator. The enumeration of places contemplated by the statute at which the sales can take place is quite limited here. It speaks of any exchange or board of trade. The suggestion I wish to make is as to whether there should not be some words of a general character immediately following the word "trade," for the reason that this is a penal statute, which is always construed strictly by the courts. I think after the word "trade" the words "or like place of exchange," or something of that kind, should be inserted.

Mr. SPOONER. The words "like place" would be enough.

Mr. BACON. "Like places" would be enough.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seemed to the committee that the word "exchange," which is a very general term and applies to all public places, would be sufficient. None of these transactions take place, so far as I know, in private places, except where they are strictly private, and of course it is not intended to cover any such transactions.

Mr. BACON. There are places which are not known as exchanges.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would the provision cover what are called "bucket shops?"

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it would. I think the word "exchange" would cover any public place where these articles are sold.

Mr. BACON. The point, if the Senator will permit me, is that, while the language might be sufficient in an ordinary statute, when you pass a criminal statute it is necessary to be very precise in the use of language. Therefore I suggest the insertion of the words "or like place."

Mr. ALDRICH. "Or other similar place."

Mr. BACON. "Or other similar place."

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BACON. Very well. After the word "trade" I move to insert in line 3 the words "or other similar place."

Mr. ALLISON. I merely wish to say that I do not think that that in any sense improves the provision, nor do I think it very greatly embarrasses it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 65, to strike out section 26, in the following words:

TONNAGE TAX.

SEC. 26. That in lieu of the tax on tonnage imposed by section 11 of chapter 481 of the laws of 1886, approved June 10, 1886, a duty of 8 cents per ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 50 cents per ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from any foreign port or place in North America, Central America, the West India Islands, the Bahama Islands, the Bermuda Islands, or the coast of South America bordering on the Caribbean Sea, or the Hawaiian Islands, or Newfoundland, and a duty of 20 cents per ton, not to exceed $2.40 per ton per annum, is hereby imposed at each entry upon all vessels which shall be entered in the United States from any other foreign port, not, however, to include vessels in distress or not engaged in trade.

From the receipts from duties on tonnage provided by this section there is hereby appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury for the maintenance of the Marine-Hospital Service, for the fiscal year 1899, the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall submit, in the estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year 1900 and annually thereafter, estimates in detail for the expenses of maintaining the Marine-Hospital Service.

Section 15 of chapter 121 of the laws of 1884, approved June 26, 1884, sections 11 and 12 of chapter 421 of the laws of 1886, approved June 19, 1886, and section 4282 of the Revised Statutes, are hereby repealed.

This section shall take effect on July 1, 1898.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now let us go back to amendment No. 177.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, it is important for us to bear in mind, in considering this bill, certain important facts.

In the first place, we ought to remember that Congress meets next December. We should remember this, because if perchance we should not provide an abundance of money to meet the necessities of war, there will be early and full opportunity to provide it at that time. In the second place, we ought to take consolation and encouragement to ourselves that there is no possible condition in which the President will not be armed by every dollar and by every man needed or desired to prosecute this war.

It is a strengthening and a delightful fact that the whole people of this country are behind their Chief Magistrate in the pending conflict. Neither Washington, in conducting the Revolution, nor Madison, in conducting the war of 1812, nor Polk, in the war with Mexico, nor Lincoln, in the unhappy fratricidal strife which has now become an ancient tale, had public sentiment so unanimously supporting his efforts to wage war as has now the honored President of this Republic, who, himself nobly guiding the way to congenial union, has the felicity of fortune to contemplate united and trusting ranks around him.

So, Mr. President, let us all remember that there is no possible exigency and no conceivable circumstance in which this Administration can be possibly embarrassed by any lack of resources, whether of treasure or manhood, to uphold the flag of the Republic and to bear it to that victory which is already assured.

NO NECESSITY OR PLAUSIBLE PRETEXT FOR BONDED DEBT AT THIS TIME.

There is another fact which is as transparent, and which if not transparent to all minds is incapable of easy demonstration. There is not the slightest occasion or plausible pretext for plunging this country at this time into any bonded debt for the purpose of prosecuting this war. If any man were dreaming in his heart of that thing which would give this Republic prestige among the nations of the earth, there is nothing conceivable which would assure that prestige more than to give demonstration to the world that it is so great, so powerful, so patriotic, so united, and so ready to respond in treasure and in blood to the calls of its Chief Magistrate that he could conduct a war without plunging this people and future generations in a public debt.

I am for meeting this war, Mr. President, in direct, plain, heroic, American fashion. We are in it for better or for worse. It imposes the highest duties and responsibilities and the sternest tasks, and they should be met here, as on land and sea, in field and in council, without flinching from their consequences. War must be paid for. There comes in the grievous burdens of taxation, but the people will bear them with a brave, self-sacrificing spirit. They will not shrink from them. No great people like the American people ever shrink from taxation honestly imposed, fairly distributed, and justly applied to a patriotic purpose.

I am not afraid of my constituents, Mr. President, to vote taxes upon them to maintain this Administration and the cause of this Republic, although they are in no good condition for those taxes to be borne. I am unwilling to mortgage posterity and to hand down a great public debt which will be the fruitful source of many burdens and a standing temptation to extravagance.

THE ESTIMATES OF EXTRAORDINARY EXPENDITURES FOR WAR.

Look, Mr. President, at the estimates which are given us by the Secretary of the Treasury, by the Secretary of War, by the Secretary of the Navy, and by the House committee, which has submitted its report in connection with the bill which has come to us. There is a general assent to the proposition that the war will cost in extraordinary expense about $25,000,000 per month. In that estimate 10 per cent of the estimates of the War Department as given us by the Secretary are added just to meet contingencies which are not foreseen. This estimate of $25,000,000 per month covers the next fiscal year—that is, carries us to July 1, 1899. Congress meets at the midway house of that period. If we provide a revenue for the whole year, or means for raising it, we will meet here and be able to correct any miscalculation which we may have made or any unforeseen exigency which may arise.

PAY AS YOU GO.

Pay as you go, Mr. President, is the manly, wise, honest maxim for man and nation. The great financiers have been the men who wanted to pay as they went. The great statesman of Great Britain who now lies dead, mourned by the civilized world and honored everywhere by the English-speaking race, was a man who had the courage to say, "Pay as you go." Give the right to issue great amounts of bonds, and ten thousand cormorants will lend their wits to invent objects of expenditure.

THE HOUSE BILL A BORROWING BILL MORE THAN A TAX BILL.

Mr. President, when we come to contemplate the House bill which is laid before the Senate we find no such heroic, manly, just, financial doctrine. It is, Pay to-morrow, or the next day after to-morrow, or in the next generation, and "Mañana, mañana," the Spanish cry, not "here and now," the American creed, becomes the watchword.

My honorable friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said in his remarks in explaining the bill to the Senate that it came to us from the House of Representatives as an internal-revenue bill, and that it came from the Senate committee to the Senate an internal-revenue bill. My honorable friend must have used his microscope to have detected the signs of its being an internal-revenue bill. In the space that it fills in the publication it is an internal-revenue bill, but there is a postscript added to the bill, which, like the traditional postscript in a lady's letter, contains the main matter of import.

A seventh part of this bill is internal revenue, an effort to raise $100,000,000 of taxes by jumping on the subjects-matter that are already taxed and increasing those taxes and by adding one or two sporadic subjects of taxation, which have been selected for some cause or other, not for any cause that I can discover known to the teachings of sound finance. One hundred millions of internal-revenue taxation and six hundred millions of debt! That is what my honorable friend calls an internal-revenue bill, because, forsooth, the many prolix clauses which concern internal revenue cover fifty or sixty pages, and because the debt of six hundred millions is disposed of in a few lines, to which should be prefaced the usual words that come in on the heading of postscript: "N. B. (nota bene).—Six hundred millions of debt."

I am opposed to the debt part of the bill, except such part as may be needed in temporary loans to preserve the Administration from any possible momentary embarrassment.

WE SHOULD PROVIDE ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY MILLIONS BY TAXATION AND A LIKE AMOUNT BY TEMPORARY LOAN.

I do not wish, Mr. President, that the Executive of this country or any of his agents shall have a moment in this war for an anxious thought as to a dollar. I hope that Congress will so provide the means of conducting it that their brows may be unclouded from the beginning to the end of the war by any troubles about men or money.

If we shall provide in this bill $150,000,000 of taxation and will provide for temporary loans—call it greenbacks, call it Treasury notes, call it certificates of indebtedness or demand notes, call it by any one of the familiar names and methods of providing for such contingency—we will have a fair perspective before us for a year; and I repeat, Mr. President, Congress meets next December. It is the peculiar duty of Congress to provide the ways and means of government; and Congress will be here to resume its business at its old constitutional stand, with the assurance to every man, woman, and child in the country that there is not a man in Congress, be he Democrat, be he Populist, or be he Republican, who does not stand at the back of the President ready to vote to him every man and every dollar that he may need, want, or desire.

Congress gives no indication that it intends to abrogate its function; and though some who now constitute it may have passed away before December comes, the body will be here, the power will be here, the disposition will be here to meet every liability and duty. To plunge this country into a great public debt now is to do so only because we want to do so, only because we are bent on doing so, whether there be a necessity or pretext for it or not, only because we are predestined and foreordained and determined to do so, although the facts stare us in the face that there is no necessity to do so; and there is nothing but the smallest color of pretext for such a contention.

THE FINANCES OF THE CIVIL WAR.

Mr. President, the Republican party of this country undertook from 1861 to 1865 one of the greatest financial enterprises of modern times—to provide ways and means for conducting one of the great wars of history. In that war there were fought over 2,300 battles. There was a battle for every day of four long years. There were over 2,200,000 men under arms in one section of the country, and they were provided with all the implements and sustained by all the resources of enlightened modern war, while a great Navy lined the Southern coasts with blockading squadrons and was equally busy on the inland waters.

There are few achievements of history which are greater than the financial conduct of the civil war, however much it may be blurred here and there by extortions.

THE STRIKING FEATURES OF CIVIL-WAR FINANCE—THE MASSES SUSTAINED THE GOVERNMENT.

There were certain striking features of that financial conduct. The first was bold and heavy taxation. Congress tried, as far as possible, the "pay-as-you-go policy," levying enormous taxes, and the exaction of an enormous fund of ready cash from the great body of the people.

It was not the great capitalists of this country, Mr. President, who sustained the Republican party in their conduct of the war. It was, first, the State banks which came forward with their issues and placed themselves at the disposal of the Government. It was the great body and mass of the brave, patriotic people of the North who were its chief reliance, as the like class were the reliance of the South. They came and poured out their treasures; they opened their purses when they sent their sons to battle.

Secretary Chase, in his report of December, 1863, said in respect to the 5-20 loan that the bonds "could not be disposed of to capitalists in amounts sufficient for prompt payment of the Army and Navy; and for the satisfaction of the just claims of public creditors generally, without serious loss, the Secretary determined to employ a general agent, under adequate bonds, and confide the whole work of distribution, except so far as it could be effected by the Treasurer, assistant treasuries, and designated depositories, to him and to subagents responsible immediately to him." Under this plan of popular loan, $400,000,000 of the 5-20 bonds in denominations of $50, $100, $500, and $1,000 were distributed, as he says, "among all classes of our countrymen."

While the people thus subscribed, they also paid heavily in taxes.

There is a sentence in Mr. Bolle's Financial History of the Civil War which carries a great lesson. He says:

Internal taxation began to yield heavily just as the war was drawing to a welcome close. For the fiscal year 1866 $310,906,984 were collected, a larger amount than was ever drawn by a nation from internal sources in twelve months. Yet this enormous sum was paid by a generation that knew no more about internal taxation than about tithes or ship money.

Crudely laid as were the internal-revenue taxes they crippled no considerable industry. They injuriously affected some minor industries, particularly those in which alcohol was used to a considerable degree in production.

Over thirty years ago, Mr. President, when we were 30,000,000 of people, and when we were torn asunder by war, this Government raised over $300,000,000 of internal revenue without crippling any of the industries of the country, only some minor ones, and conducted to a successful issue a war which had over 2,200,000 men in the field, fighting battles for breakfast, dinner, and supper every day that the sun rolled around. One feature, I repeat, of that war was that patriotism stood up and had its dollars counted, and paid for the cause in which it had enlisted.

BONDED DEBT COMPARATIVELY SMALL DURING THE CIVIL WAR.

Another of the striking features of the finances of the civil war was this, that the bonded debt, in proportion to the greatness of the occasion and to the demands upon the Government, was economically and sparingly employed for the conduct of that war. I have made an estimate of the amounts of money which were borrowed during the civil war on permanent bonded obligations. It was a little over $1,000,000,000, about twice as much as it is proposed in this bill to borrow now upon the threshold of this war with Spain, before we have fought a land battle.

I will give the items of this statement, Mr. President, which is one made by myself from a collation of the reports, so that its correctness may be examined and tested. More bonds were indeed authorized by the Congress, but not more than the sum stated were negotiated and used. On the 8th of February, 1861, Congress authorized 6 per cent bonds to the amount of $25,000,000. They were issued at a discount of a little over $2,000,000, and only to the extent of $18,415,000. On July 17, 1861, $250,000,000 of 7 per cent twenty-year bonds were authorized, of which $44,000,000 were issued in 1862 and $76,000,000 in 1863; in all, up to July 1, 1865, $247,000,000. But I have here the items of this calculation.

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest to the Senator to insert the memorandum in full in his remarks.

Mr. DANIEL. I shall give the statement in extenso, that its accuracy may be tested, and that, if any mistake may have crept therein, it may be happily corrected.

WAR LOANS ON INTEREST-BEARING BONDS, 1861-1865.

On the 8th of February, 1861, Congress authorized 6 per cent bonds to the amount of $25,000,000 to be issued.

Total of bonded debt created during the war, 1861-65, $1,068,738,251.67.

Mr. ALLISON. If I do not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. DANIEL. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. Does that statement include all the interest-bearing debt?

Mr. DANIEL. I am coming to that now.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg pardon.

Mr. DANIEL. I shall not overlook that. I am discriminating between the three sources of revenue which supplied the Government. The first was taxation; the second was bonded indebtedness.

There were other sources of revenue than taxation and the bonded indebtedness, and they were various in form and in use.

THE GREENBACK ISSUES OF $450,000,000 DURING THE WAR.

The first source of money other than taxation and bonded indebtedness was the greenbacks. They were the legal-tender Treasury notes of the United States, of which $1,600,559,947 was issued for the purpose of conducting the war. I do not mean that it should be understood that $1,600,559,947 of paper was created, except in a modified sense; and that sense will be understood when I refer to the statute.

On February 25, 1862, an issue of $150,000,000 of greenbacks was authorized; on July 11, 1862, $150,000,000 more were authorized, and on March 3, 1863, $500,000,000 more were authorized—an authorization of $450,000,000 of greenbacks. But with the authorization of their issue was the power to reissue them when they came into the Treasury through taxation; and their original issue and their repeated issue under the same authority amounted to an issue of one billion six hundred and odd million dollars, though, of course, it was but $450,000,000 that this Government was required to redeem otherwise than through the successive payments into and out of the Treasury in their employment as money.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. DANIEL. Perhaps I may answer the question the Senator intends to ask in a moment, and I will ask him only to reserve it for a moment, until I get through with this part of my statement.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. DANIEL. Certificates of indebtedness bearing 6 per cent interest, payable one year after date, a temporary loan of $561,753,241.65, were issued. Then there was the employment, from time to time, under various statutes, of Treasury notes bearing interest, but all of them in the nature of transient loans.

Now, I shall be glad to yield to any question the Senator from Iowa desires to ask.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that as to greenbacks or United States notes the limit was that they were not to exceed $450,000,000 at any one time. So there never was outstanding of the greenbacks at any one time more than $450,000,000.

Mr. DANIEL. That is entirely correct.

Mr. ALLISON. Fifty millions of which were out for a specified purpose and were to be speedily redeemed.

Mr. DANIEL. I thought I made that clear in my statement by showing that though in their successive issues they amounted to that much, $1,600,559,947, they were always the same $450,000,000; and that was the limit for which any amount must be outstanding at any one time.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course the Senator speaking of successive issues led me to believe for the moment that he meant that those issues were piled one upon the other.

Mr. DANIEL. Not at all. I tried to make it clear that they were not. I do not wish to have it otherwise than exactly as it is.

So, then, Mr. President, these great features appear: First, taxation to meet, as far as it was possible to meet them, engagements as they were incurred; second, the sparing use of permanent bonded credit; and, third, the contrivance of greenbacks, Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, and other methods of temporary loans, they all being designed to subserve the common purpose and to attain a clear and specific end; that is to say, to financier to meet the occasion with as little burden to the public as possible, and to complete the scheme of financiering at the close of the enterprise being conducted when the whole field might be traversed and the whole matter summed up into permanent after measures. And I might add, Mr. President, that the national banks constituted a fourth important feature of war finance, and these we have still in existence.

WE SHOULD CONSERVE OUR RESOURCES.

Mr. President, we are now at the very threshold of war. No seer, sage, or prophet who ever lived could predict surely what war will lead to or how long war will last when war has once begun; but that very fact, instead of predisposing our minds to a great and extravagant scheme upon the threshold, ought to warn us in the beginning to survey the field with calmness and with prudence; and while we should spend with unsparing hand every dollar and furnish every man and make every sacrifice that patriotism might dictate, we should conserve our resources and hold all the forces of the Government in hand, so that if emergency should arise, if the unexpected should happen, our reserve forces, instead of being irritated and exhausted, will be in good shape to plant a massive blow which will dispose of any foe we may encounter.

If at this juncture, when we have never fought a land battle, when it may be—God grant it may be—that when Congress next meets we may meet in peace, if, without knowledge on that subject, we start out upon the extravagant system of putting the printing press at work to mortgage future generations, God knows what a debt may be piled upon this nation when that war ends or what burdens may be put upon our resources before the day comes when they will be most needed.

THE HOUSE BILL A DISAPPOINTMENT.

Mr. President, I confess that I have read the House bill with a sense of disappointment. I do not claim to be wiser than the honorable gentlemen who represent the other parties of Congress, nor to be free from those partisan tendencies which I believe are likely to be the characteristics of sincere natures, but I would hope for my love of country, which is stronger than love of party, that this war might be so prudently, so sagaciously, so economically conducted that they who hold the helm might justly deserve to receive the applause of all the citizens of this country without regard to party.

I had rather that the Democracy should be defeated in elections than that the arms of the United States should receive reverse in battle or that any affliction should come upon the people of our common country from any mistakes in financial management or otherwise. That is my sincere feeling, and it is not with the spirit of the carping critic or with any disposition to assert superior patriotism that I make my animadversion upon this bill.

THE THEORY OF THE BILL.

Mr. President, let us read the report that comes with this bill, and let us see the theory upon which its authors have predicated it, and how they themselves have carried out their own theories. The report associated with the bill comes from the other House of Congress, and says:

As the expenses of the preparations for defense that have been going on for nearly two months are at the rate of twenty-five millions per month, or three hundred millions per annum, and the expenses of actual war will be much more, your committee are of opinion that the necessities of the country, as well as the early successful conclusion of the war, call for such ample provision, both by taxation and authority to make loans, for means to carry on naval and military operations as will impress the great powers of Europe as well as Spain with the conviction that the people of the United States are united in the determination to prosecute the war on a scale and with a vigor that make prolongation of hostilities useless.

If it is desired to issue $500,000,000 of bonds to make Spain believe that the people of this country are united and resolute, I would suggest that if we can not find some other means of imparting that information to Spain, I am for the issuance of $500,000,000 of bonds, a thousand million, two thousand million, or any number of millions that will carry conviction to Spain on that subject.

I am no critic of the military operations of the Government. I do not doubt that they are well advised and that the arrangements are well planned with a view to the effective handling of our land and naval forces, but if Spain was not convinced at Manila as to the feeling of this country on the subject of the Spanish war, my opinion is that Commodore Sampson and Commodore Schley and Major-General Miles and some of his lieutenants have some arguments to submit to Spain on that subject and some means of having those arguments speedily heard round about Cuba which are just as sure vehicles of conviction as plunging this country into a debt and mortgaging future generations.

I am further of opinion, Mr. President, that taxing all classes now fearlessly and fairly, without looking over our shoulder to our constituents to ascertain whether or not they are patriots enough to bear that taxation—aye, with the assured and unquestioning conviction that they are—would be as convincing an argument to the civilized world as placing 3 per cent bonds upon the market and drawing drafts on our children and grandchildren to pay them.

The report of the House committee says:

Your committee recommend the levying of internal-revenue taxes—

Now, let us see the theory of the bill—

either on articles of voluntary consumption or on objects that will make such taxes fall mainly on persons able to contribute to the national defense, which will, in the aggregate, yield from ninety to one hundred millions of additional annual revenue.

And here are the items of the articles of "voluntary consumption" and of the classification of "persons able to contribute to the national defense," with the amounts that will probably be realized:

One dollar per barrel additional tax on fermented liquors, estimated to yield an increased revenue of	$23,000,000
Six cents per pound additional tax on tobacco and on tobacco in stock	15,000,000
A special tax of $1.80 per annum on dealers in tobacco and cigars, etc.	5,000,000
An increase of $1 per thousand on cigars and cigarettes	5,000,000
A stamp tax on documents, instruments, checks, proprietary medicines, etc., substantially the same as it existed in 1890, with certain additions	30,000,000
A stamp tax on wines, mineral waters, and beverages sold in bottles, unestimated
An increase in the tonnage tax on vessels in the foreign trade	2,000,000

These are all taxes on objects which were assessed during or subsequent to the civil war, with one exception, and therefore open up no new and untried system of taxation. They are all internal revenue war taxes, that can be collected by the existing internal-revenue officials, slightly increased, with a small additional expense, and with the minimum disturbance of trade, although they are all taxes which are unwelcome, and which it would not have been necessary to impose if war had been avoided.

PROPOSED TAXES ON VOLUNTARY CONSUMPTION AND THOSE ABLE TO PAY.

Now, as to putting taxes on articles of voluntary consumption, it seems to me it should be borne in mind that those particular articles of voluntary consumption which are selected by the bill are old friends of ours, who belong to the regular army of Government supporters. They are beer and tobacco, and proprietary medicines are added. It has not occurred to these sagacious gentlemen who invented this patriotic war tax that the people of the United States have any voluntary disposition to consume anything else than beer and tobacco and proprietary medicines. This "voluntary consumption," if we may believe the House bill, is confined to such few articles that the spectacles of that committee have not detected or discovered any of their countrymen in the voluntary consumption of anything else than tobacco and beer and proprietary medicines.

If, Mr. President, those things which human nature needs for its sustenance to maintain and to encourage it in the mere act of preserving the transient existence which God has given it are to be taxed and if that taxation is to be confined only to those things which are used from taste and which it might deny itself and yet manage to breathe, is it possible that these gentlemen could discover, amidst the many luxuries of society of all kinds—the gold plate that adorns the table, the picture costing hundreds of thousands of dollars that decorates the wall, the artistic furniture, the bric-a-brac, the costly dress, the fine carriage, the silk, the velvet, the diamond, the confectionery—is it possible that they could discover nothing else that mankind voluntarily consumes but tobacco and beer and articles already heavily taxed, with proprietary medicines thrown in?

PERSONS ABLE TO PAY.

The next idea that controlled the committee, as they claim, was that they ought to put the taxes on persons able to contribute to the national defense. Mr. President, is there any man in this country except, perhaps, some poor brother who has been cast aside and lies in hospital or poorhouse—is there any other man in this country, whatever be his vocation or residence, who is not able to contribute something to the national defense?

The class who are able to contribute to the national defense, according to the theory and plan of this bill, would give a very hopeless horoscope to this nation in war with Spain or anybody else, for they are only the people who use tobacco and drink beer and want proprietary medicines and who pay the stamp tax on documents in the method of transacting business with a little tonnage tax thrown in. Is it not a little singular, Mr. President, that in looking around for the people of this country who are able to contribute to the national defense most of the possessors of the great mass of national wealth were scrupulously evaded?

There are two kinds of ability to contribute to the national defense. The one is physical ability, material ability, financial ability, and the other is moral ability. A man has got to have both financial and moral ability in order to contribute voluntarily, at least, to the national defense. The classification of those who are able to contribute to the national defense is those who transact certain affairs in commerce and who make their little contributions by stamps—some ten of all the vocations in the United States, of which presently I will give a list, and those who drink beer and smoke tobacco and buy proprietary articles.

THE HOUSE BILL A TAX ON THE MASSES AND AN EXEMPTION FOR THE MOST PART OF WEALTH.

Mr. President, this is a bill to tax the masses of the people an enormous percentage to carry on the war, to tax the masses of the people in their little daily transactions of life, in their economical refreshments and stimulants. Tobacco is a ration to the soldier and to the sailor. Beer is the luxury of those who are termed the common people. The accustomed luxuries of life are necessities. It is as necessary to the soldier, to steady his nerves, if he is accustomed to chew tobacco, to have his little quid as it is for him to have meat and bread.

Refined and developed society has made necessities of the common and ordinary luxuries of life, and this is a bill which puts the burden of the war at its very threshold and before we have yet fought a battle upon land on the masses of the common people of this country, upon the articles of their consumption, upon the details of their daily callings, upon the very people who with patriotic impulse and inspiration are saying to father, brother, and son: "Take your gun and fight for your flag, and may God's blessing go with you."

Mr. President, the authors of this bill have carefully protected the wealth of the country from the burdens of war, so far as it was possible for them in a bill to achieve that result; and they have shown, sir, that so far as they are concerned they have a poor opinion of the generation in which they live in wishing to shuffle off the burden of war upon future generations, and a poor opinion of the men who have used the advantages created by this great free nation to accumulate the wealth which they would now shut off from bearing more than a trivial portion of the burden of the war.

THE SUBJECTS OF TAXATION IN THE HOUSE BILL.

Mr. President, let us see what are the subjects of taxation embraced by the House bill. An additional dollar a barrel on beer, which is already paying $1; 6 cents additional per pound on tobacco already paying 6 cents per pound; special taxes on dealers in tobacco; an increase of a dollar a thousand on cigars and cigarettes; stamp taxes on documents, instruments, checks, proprietary medicines, substantially the same as existed in 1866, with certain qualifications; stamp taxes on wines, mineral waters, beverages sold in quantities, and proprietary medicines, and an increase in the tonnage tax on vessels in the foreign trade.

IMPROVEMENTS OF SENATE COMMITTEE.

My honorable colleagues of the Senate committee have, as I concede, made some very valuable additions to the bill. In the first place, they have suggested a license tax, which will be found on pages 3 to 6 of the bill, on ten different vocations. I will read those vocations. They are, first, bankers; second, brokers; third, pawnbrokers; fourth, commercial brokers; fifth, custom-house brokers; sixth, foreign insurance agents; seventh, proprietors of theaters, museums, and concert halls; eighth, proprietors of circuses; ninth, proprietors or agents of all other public exhibitions or shows for money; tenth, proprietors of bowling alleys and billiard rooms.

These ten classes are segregated from the rest of the business community of the United States, and the committee has paid them the compliment of believing that they stand ready to make their contributions to carry on the war. So far as this amendment goes, I commend my colleagues for incorporating it into the bill and believe it is an improvement thereon.

Mr. LINDSAY. I desire to ask the Senator if the committee has made any estimate of the amount of revenue which will be raised by those licenses?

Mr. DANIEL. None that I am aware of. On the question of estimate I will answer the Senator from Kentucky more at length when I have finished the statement of the improvements in general of this bill by the Senate committee.

The Senate committee has also recommended a legacy and distributive tax on personal property, and has made the stamp tax applicable to stock and other transactions which may be equitably and profitably taxed. And a majority of the committee has recommended an excise tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent on gross receipts. While there are many minor changes in the bill, the statement of the House bill which I have made and the synopsis of the Senate changes comprehend the general features of the tax scheme.

DIFFICULTY IN ESTIMATING THE AMOUNTS TO BE DERIVED FROM THE AMENDED BILL.

Mr. President, as to estimates, I will state that as a member of the Finance Committee I regret that I am unable to impart to my colleagues upon the floor much enlightenment as to the amount of revenue that the bill will raise. Frankly, I must say I do not know. A guess would be in the dark, and I could only make a rude and unreliable conjecture. But I do not feel wholly at fault. I have tried the best I could to get information upon those branches of the bill with which I have been more particularly and intimately connected.

I have addressed the Bureau of Statistics. My communications have gone to the Treasury Department and to the Interior, and they have been almost fruitless of result. I might perhaps say, figuratively, I have been in my inquiries—

Dropping buckets into empty wells,
And growing old in drawing nothing up.

It is the responsibility of those who propose tax measures to present to those who are to vote upon them enlightened statistics and information as to their estimate. None have been furnished to our committee. I have used all the efforts that I could within the limited time allowed me to get estimates for myself. I have had my secretary specially occupied in the Library in search of data. I do not wish to cast any reflection upon my colleagues of the committee, but I will say that if I were in power and if I had at my disposal those who could employ their exertions and agencies to enlighten Congress on this subject, I would not be urging the passage of a bill involving so many hundreds of millions of money without better information as to what the provisions of the bill will raise.

Here are some of the letters I have received, which show the difficulties which the Departments and bureaus have in supplying information and the difficulty the committee has in obtaining it:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

Washington, D. C., May 2, 1898.

SIR: I am in receipt of your favor of the 7th instant, asking for the receipts of corporations, to wit, street railways, sleeping-car companies, etc., and regret to inform you that this Bureau is not in possession of any information on the subject other than what the census may show. I have therefore referred your letter to the Census Bureau, Interior Department, as the best source of the information.

Respectfully, yours,

O. P. AUSTIN,
Chief of Bureau.

HON. JOHN W. DANIEL, U. S. S.,
United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS DIVISION.

Washington, May 10, 1898.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt, by reference from the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, of your letter of the 7th instant requesting to be advised of the gross receipts of certain corporations.

In reply I have to say, that of the corporations mentioned, but two—those relating to street railways and petroleum refining—were included within the scope of the Eleventh Census investigations, and the report upon petroleum refining gives only the expense and amount of product. The gross receipts from sale of product and other sources was not required.

The report on street railways will, I think, furnish the information you wish under that head. I have mailed you a copy of this report in a separate package.

Very respectfully,

C. N. BLISS,
Secretary.

HON. JNO. W. DANIEL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The Senator from Iowa, as a member of the committee, and doubtless others of his colleagues, have made exertions similar to mine to get information, but no one's exertions have been fruitful of such results as we might wish to have. In a letter addressed to the Senator from Iowa by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department we have some estimates of what the excise tax would raise, but I know that those estimates are very far of the mark, that their data is six or seven years old for the most part, and they can only give us a basis of conjecture as to what present results will be.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

Washington, D. C., May 4, 1898.

SIR: In reply to your letter of May 3, I give the latest figures of gross receipts of various businesses, as I have been able to find them:

	Year.	Amount.
Telegraph, Western Union.....	1897	$22,638,859
Telephone, Bell.....	1898	4,538,979
Railroads.....	1898	1,125,682,025
Steamboat and canal.....	1899	166,838,776
Express companies.....	1899	45,788,123
Insurance:
Life.....	1899	181,707,097
Fire.....	1899	577,540,042
Total.....		1,924,730,501

Only the returns of the Western Union Telegraph Company are available. From the Financial Chronicle of 1896 the gross revenue of the Postal Telegraph Company in 1895 was $4,321,290. There may be some smaller companies, but I am unable to determine how many they may be. It is safe to say that their earnings are small when set against those of these two companies.

The returns for shipping and canal receipts are taken from the census of 1890 and include all traffic on river, canal, lake, and coast. No later returns can I find; but if we should judge by the lake traffic the receipts must be perceptibly larger at the present time than they were in 1890.

The figures given for the express companies are the total expenditures, which include dividends. No table of receipts is given in the census, but this table of expenditures appears to include every item except what may be set aside for a reserve or surplus fund. It is safe to accept them as representing the gross receipts.

The returns for life insurance include those received by assessment, fraternal, and beneficiary orders. Of the $181,767,007 given as received, $140,592,937 was obtained from premiums.

Respectfully, yours,

WORTHINGTON C. FORD,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
United States Senate.

EXCISE TAX ON PERSONS, FIRMS, AND CORPORATIONS RATED BY GROSS RECEIPTS.

The information sought in this correspondence was with special reference to the excise tax on corporations and firms rated by gross receipts; and that correspondence at least shows that we may raise large sums by small taxes on the subjects embraced therein. One of the amendments which levy this tax and which I had the honor to propose is in brief form as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act every person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing, or having the care or management of, any railroad, street railroad, sleeping car, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal boat, or other vessel, or any stage coach or other vehicle, except hacks or carriages not running on continuous routes, engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or freight for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, shall be subject to and pay a special annual excise tax equivalent to one-fourth of 1 per cent of the gross receipts from passengers, mails, shippers, or freighters of any such railroad, street railroad, sleeping car, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal boat, or other vessel, or such stage coach or other vehicle.

It applies the same principle to any person, firm, company, or corporation carrying on or doing an express business, or having the care or management of any telegraphic or telephone line, or having the care and management of any business for life, fire, marine, or accident insurance or for the security and assurance of employers against losses by negligence or other misconduct of employees.

It applies also to those engaged in the business of furnishing gas, electric light, electric power, steam heat, steam power, refining petroleum, or refining sugar.

TAX ON BANKS.

There has been added under this head a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent on the average amount of deposits in banks. These are enormous. The deposits of banks and loan companies amount to above five thousand three hundred and fifty millions of dollars. They are owned by about 10,000,000 of people having an average deposit of about $500 apiece; and a vast sum equitably distributed would be reached by this tax. But it is to be noted that banks are required to pay a special license tax in an anterior part of the bill, amounting to about one-fifth of 1 per cent on their capital, and either that tax or this, as it seems to me, should be stricken out. Double taxation and cumulative taxation should be avoided, and a small tax generally distributed would be more just.

THE ADVANTAGE OF EXCISE TAXES RATED BY GROSS RECEIPTS.

These excise taxes rated by gross receipts come under the theory of the House committee's report, as they are on those "able to pay." They come also under its theory of being laid according to familiar methods of collection, and as being of easy administration. We would provide by this measure a great sum of money by a very small tax upon a large number of people, and we would be putting that tax where it will fall lightest, upon those most able to bear it, where it will distribute its burden more equally all over the country and amongst all classes of the people, and where it will give the least vexation and trouble to both collector and taxpayer.

THE STAMP TAX PESTIFEROUS.

The stamp taxes recommended by the House bill are onerous and annoying. Of them the druggists are the leading martyrs. There is no more pestiferous tax that could be invented by the wit of man. We were told a year or two years ago that while the income tax might be in some senses just, we ought not to levy it because it was a monarchical tax, and the fine sentimentality of the American people against monarchical institutions and monarchical practices and everything that savored in the remotest degree of monarchy ought to make us revolt against an income tax.

I have heard that argument addressed on this floor seriously to the Senate of the United States. I have seen it displayed in headlines in the great journals of civilization, so called. If such sentimentality ought to enter into this subject, what would the American people say about a stamp tax, smelling as it does of ancient tyranny and foreign oppression? But in itself, apart from any historic or traditional association, a stamp tax is the most odious and pestiferous form of taxation that can be invented. You are never done paying it. Anybody who is in business will be paying that tax every business day of the year. He will feel uneasy all the time he is paying it, and never satisfied, because there are penalties hovering over his head in every direction.

He is a marked man, with the eye of the law always upon him. He can not fumble a paper or deed or transfer a share of stock or go along any familiar course of business without thinking, "Have I paid that tax? Have I paid that tax?" It haunts him day and night and every hour of every day, and its ghost lingers over him, bringing fear and apprehension that perhaps there was not enough muckilage on the stamp, that it might slip off, and that with the slipping off of the stamp he may slip into jail or have to pay a fine for not having paid the tax.

Now, Mr. President, while I thus comment upon that tax, I may vote for it. If I vote for it I will take the responsibility of the burden, and share it with my colleagues, of having helped to put upon the people an odious, vexatious, and troublesome tax. I want to be a patriot and bear my burden in this war, and I am willing to stand up and do it if it be needful to support the hands that are bearing muskets.

TAXATION SHOULD BE FAIRLY AND IMPARTIALLY DISTRIBUTED.

Mr. President, I want to see the great bulk of the burden of this war tax distributed amongst all classes with a fair and impartial hand, and I would like, if possible, to avoid this stamp tax if it can be properly accomplished. I do not wish to be invited to impose odious taxes and to double that tax upon my own people by those who shrink from taxing wealth in its massive corporate character, by those who shrink from commending to the wealthy and powerful the cup which they press to our lips and ask us to press to the lips of our people.

Historically, and by the practices of the Republican and Democratic parties, by the practices of the legislature of every State in this country, and by the Congress of the United States on many and repeated occasions, this excise tax on gross receipts, or, more properly speaking, measured by gross receipts, is a wise and a just tax.

SUCH EXCISE TAXES MUCH HEAVIER HERETOFORE.

Mr. President, when I contemplate how small this particular tax is in this bill, I may say for my colleagues on the committee and myself, as Clive said with respect to his doings in India, "I am astonished at our moderation." Let us look at the model from which this tax was taken. It was in the internal-revenue act of 1864, which was carried forward and perpetuated for many years thereafter.

Let us see what tax that act imposed upon these very subjects-matter. Two and one-half per cent on the gross receipts of railroads, canals, steamboats, ships, barges, canal boats, vessels, stage coaches, and other vehicles. This is but a tenth of that tax. The act of 1864 imposed also a tax of 2½ per cent on ferries and bridges receiving tolls for passengers or freight, 3 per cent on the gross receipts of express companies, 1½ per cent on premiums of inland, marine, or fire insurance, 3 per cent on the gross receipts of telegraph companies, and 2 per cent on the receipts of theaters and circuses. And how about banks? Why, banks were taxed in every direction—one-half per cent on average deposits, one-fourth per cent on capital, and 1 per cent on circulation, all in one tax. They did not stop there.

THE INCOME TAX IN 1864.

Besides all these taxes there was levied 5 per cent on incomes, rents, interest, dividends, salaries from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the date of that act?

Mr. DANIEL. June 30, 1864; and I have here a copy of the Congressional Globe, showing the history of the passage of that act in the Senate. I have not the time to read but little from the Globe, but some sentiments expressed would be worthy of adoption now. Senator Foot, of Vermont, declared that the patriotic people—are not unwilling to be taxed; they expect to be taxed, and they will be content to be taxed to the utmost extent which the necessities of the country require.

They expect, however, as they have a right to expect, that these taxes shall be levied according to their several ability and means to pay without prejudice upon the one hand or favoritism upon the other and in pursuance of some equitable and uniform rate of assessment.

Good doctrine that! Senator Foot declared himself ready to vote for a 5 per cent income tax, and neither he nor any of his colleagues intimated a doubt as to its constitutionality.

There were many able men of both parties in the Senate then, eminent lawyers and statesmen—Foot and Collamer, Garrett Davis and Reverdy Johnson, Hendricks and Henderson, Trumbull, Grimes, Doolittle, Wilson, Sumner, Chandler, Fessenden, and Morrill, of Maine—not the honored Senator from Vermont, now our colleague.

Mr. CHILTON. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. No; not the Senator from Vermont, but Morrill from Maine.

Mr. CHILTON. He was in the other House.

Mr. DANIEL. Yes; the present Senator from Vermont was. When the income tax was considered, although it was 5 per cent, there was no man in the Senate who thought it unconstitutional; no one denied the then settled doctrine of the United States Supreme Court that it was constitutional. While Mr. Sumner did not express himself as being entirely favorable to the tax, he voted for it. At the same time, however, he commended to the Senate the doctrine of Say, the French political economist, who taught that income taxes should be levied on a graduated scale—the system practiced in Great Britain now—and Mr. Sumner commended that system and plan to the Senate. Three hundred and fifty million dollars of income tax has been paid into the Treasury of the United States, neither taxpayer or tax layer conceiving the idea that anything unconstitutional was being done.

THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT AND THE INCOME TAX.

I have great respect, Mr. President, for the Supreme Court of the United States. The fact that I might venture humbly to differ with them in respect to some one of their various opinions, not being able, of course, to agree in all their opinions when they are contradictory to each other, does not alter my respect either for the bench as an institution or for the gentlemen who for the time being may occupy the position of judges there, but if in the long experience of the court of over a hundred years the judges have expressed themselves on all sides of a question, I hope I may permit my mind to settle down on one side, not being able to follow them in their diversified views.

I believe it is a bench of honor and integrity, of learning and skill. Its decrees ought to be and always will be obeyed. But I venture to say, Mr. President, that the sanction of judicial decision and the prestige of judicial opinion have been more weakened by the change of opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by the overturning of its historic, traditional, well-settled doctrine that the income tax was constitutional, than by anything any critics could remark or by any animadversion whatsoever that might be made upon the institution or the judges.

But it is human to err. Kings err, presidents err, judges and Congresses err. In the long course of time error will be corrected. Minds equally capable will still pursue the truth, and in the long run the truth is sure to win and conquer. We have still five cases of record in which the court gave opinions favorable to the income tax and only one against it (though that case was twice heard); we have still the majority of the judges who from time to time have passed on the subject strongly in favor of the tax, and with Story, Kent, Cooley, Bancroft, Miller, Hare, Burroughs, Black, and other equally eminent authorities supporting them, the casualty of a divided court that overruled them may not prove irreparable.

But, Mr. President, I am not going to traverse the last decision now; I am not going to recommend an income tax at this juncture. In the midst of war we want to tread upon firm and solid ground, and here is a broad, beaten highway, a highway beaten by the feet of every legislature in the country, by repeated action of Congress, by the unbroken and unquestioned decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and we travel that highway in this bill with a temper of patriotism and moderation.

THE CORPORATION-FRANCHISE TAX.

Then follows the excise tax on certain persons, firms, and corporations, a distinct tax on corporate franchises, which reads:

Sac. — That every corporation doing business in the United States, whether chartered under the laws of the United States, or of any State or Territory of the United States, or any foreign country, shall pay a special annual excise tax; and said tax shall be the equivalent of one-fourth of 1 per cent of the whole amount of the gross receipts of such corporations derived from such business: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any corporation that is subjected to excise tax under section — of this act, nor to religious, educational, benevolent, eleemosynary, or cemetery corporations; municipal or other public corporations; Masonic or other like fraternities; building and loan associations, or associations which make loans only to their shareholders; nor shall corporations which buy and sell raw or unmanufactured domestic agricultural products be required to pay any tax with respect to such dealings.

LEGAL PROPOSITIONS.

I have no doubt that this tax is constitutional, and I think these legal propositions are abundantly sustained by text writers and judicial decisions alike. It is settled (1) that corporate franchise is a distinct subject of taxation, and not as property, but as the exercise of a privilege; (2) that it may be taxed by a State or country which creates it; (3) it may be taxed by a State or Territory in which it is exercised, although created by a foreign country; (4) it may be taxed by the United States, whether created by the United States or a foreign country or by a State, Territory, or District of the United States.

And while I am upon that subject, Mr. President, I might say that this bill in other parts does tax banks and bankers, which is a corporation excise franchise tax, one-fifth of 1 per cent in the license-tax scheme which was recommended to you by the committee. So if we were seeking a precedent for the proposition in amendment 117, we would find it in the previous text of the bill.

(5) The franchise of the corporation may also be taxed by a State, although created by the United States, unless created as a part of the governmental machinery of the United States, and (6) it may be taxed by a State although created as a part of the governmental machinery of the United States, if the consent of the United States be given thereto, as in the case of national banks.

Now, as this is a subject that I have never heard discussed in this body, I propose to give a few decisions, that the scheme of this bill may be thoroughly understood, and that its firm and stanch position in constitutional jurisprudence may be recognized. In the case of the Society for Savings against Coite, in 6 Wallace, 594, there was a striking instance of the exercise of the constitutional power of the sovereign in a State to tax the franchise of a corporation.

The legislature of Connecticut had in 1863 enacted that the several savings banks should make annual return to the comptroller of public accounts of the total amount of all deposits. It appeared that of their deposits, which amounted to $4,758,000, some $500,000,000 were invested in securities of the United States. It was contended in the case that these securities of the United States were exempted from taxation, and that therefore the State of Connecticut could not levy its franchise tax on the deposits of the bank in so far as those deposits had been transformed by law into the form of United States securities. So the question was presented to the Supreme Court in the sharpest form that it could arise for judicial arbitration. Judge Clifford gave the opinion of the court, that sustained the tax, even to the amount in which the deposit was invested in United States bonds, and said:

Power to tax is granted for the benefit of all, and none have any right to complain if the power is fairly exercised and the proceeds are properly applied to discharge the obligations for which the taxes were imposed. Such a power resides in government as a part of itself and need not be reserved when property of any description or the right to use it in any manner is granted to individuals or corporate bodies.

Unless exempted in terms which amount to a contract, the privileges and franchises of a private corporation are as much the legitimate subject of taxation as any other property of the citizens which is within the sovereign power of the State. Repeated decisions of this court have held, in respect to such corporations, that the taxing power of the State is never presumed to be relinquished, and consequently that it exists unless the intention to relinquish it is declared in clear and unambiguous terms.

And here is what was said as to corporate franchises:

Corporate franchises are legal estates vested in the corporation itself as soon as it is in esse. They are not mere naked powers granted to the corporation, but powers coupled with an interest which vest in the corporation upon the possession of its franchises, and, whatever may be thought of the corporations, it can not be denied that the corporation itself has a legal interest in such franchises.

Nothing can be more certain in legal decision than that the privileges and franchises of a private corporation and all trades and avocations by which the citizens acquire a livelihood may be taxed by a State for the support of the State government. Authority to that effect resides in the State independent of the Federal Government, and is wholly unaffected by the fact that the corporation or individual has or has not made investment in Federal securities.

Private corporations engaged in their own business and pursuing their own interests according to their own will are as much subject to the taxing power of the State as individuals, and it can not make any difference whether the tax is imposed upon their property, unless exempted by some paramount law or the franchises of the corporation, as both are alike under the protection and within the control of the sovereign power.

In Connecticut the case of Coite vs. Society for Savings, reported in 33 Conn., 173 (1864), was heard before it went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the supreme court of that State held the excise tax to be valid, thus explaining their decision:

There is no reason why they [the savings banks] should not contribute their full share to support the government through which they exist and flourish. At first their number and deposits were so small, and their objects and results so beneficent, that they were properly relieved from the common burden. They have since been found so advantageous, not only to the humble few whose interests they were expected to subserve, but to the public at large, that in this State they have attracted to their vaults nearly $30,000,000.

They act under charters from the State, for which other banks formerly paid high premiums. Their franchise confers privileges of great value. A corporation is a creature of law, invisible and intangible and possessing properties by which a succession of persons are considered the same. It may buy, sell, contract, sue and be sued, take, hold, and transmit property, as though it were a single individual, and that one an immortal being.

Over this class of corporations the State keeps careful and continual watch. It requires that the trustees shall neither receive any pay nor derive any benefit from the use of the funds, and that they shall render their regular accounts. It sends their commissioners to examine their condition and protect their interests. It exempts them from all taxation, except the one in question, and a tax on their real estate not used for banking purposes. The importance of this exemption is very great and is increasing with a fearful rapidity.

In return for these privileges an equivalent is exacted in the payment of a tribute in the form prescribed by statute. There is difficulty in arranging the mode of taxation adapted to these institutions. It was said by Judge Eliaworth, in the case of Savings Bank vs. New London, 20 Conn., 117, that they have properly no "stock and no capital." They are merely places of deposit where money can be left to remain or be taken out at the pleasure of the owner. The sums held by them are perpetually changing. On these accounts the legislature established as a rule of assessment the amount of deposits on hand at particular times.

In Provident Institution vs. Massachusetts (6 Wall., 1867, 611), the doctrines of the case of Society for Savings vs. Coite were thoroughly reviewed and reiterated. It appeared therein that institutions for saving incorporated under Massachusetts laws were required by statute to pay to the treasurer of the Commonwealth

"a tax on account of its depositors of one-half of 1 per cent per annum on the amount of its deposits, to be assessed, one-half of said annual tax on the average amount of its deposits for the six months preceding the 1st day of May, and the other on the average amount of its deposits for the six months preceding the 1st day of November." Under the twelfth section of the act "all property taxed" under the above section is exempted from taxation for the current year in which the tax was paid, and savings banks were relieved from making return of deposits in accordance with the provisions of previous statutes.

With this statute in existence the Provident Institution for Savings, a corporation without property, except its deposits and the property in which their deposits were invested, and empowered under general law of the State to receive money on deposit for the use and benefit of the depositors and to invest its securities in the securities of the United States, had as its average amount of deposits for the six months preceding the 1st day of May, 1865, $8,047,652.19, of which $1,327,000 was invested in public funds of the United States, exempt by law of the United States from taxation by any State.

It paid all taxes assessed against it except on that part of the deposits so invested in United States securities, refusing to pay the tax on such portion. The Commonwealth sued for the tax thus refused to be paid. The supreme judicial court of the State, considering that the tax was one on the franchise and not on property, adjudged the tax lawful, and gave judgment for the Commonwealth.

The case went up on the question whether or not the State by force of its statutes could exact the tax on the portion of the institution's deposits invested in the securities of the United States. The court explained that it was not a tax on property, but on a franchise, and Clifford, J., said:

Considered as a tax on property no part of the tax could be supported under the constitution of the State, and there never was a moment when such a tax, if viewed as a property tax, could be upheld since the State was organized under a written constitution. The amount of the tax does not depend on the amount of the property held by the institution, but it depends upon the capacity of the institution to exercise the privileges conferred by the charter.

Valuation of the property has nothing to do with determining the amount of the tax, but the amount depends on the average amount of the deposits for the six months preceding the respective days named, and it is quite obvious that there is no necessary relation between the average amount of the deposits and the amount of property owned by the institution. Granting that it is not a property tax, then it must be considered as a franchise tax laid upon the corporation for the privileges conferred by the charter, which, by all the authorities, it is competent for the State to tax, irrespective of what disposition the institution has made of the funds or in what manner they may have been invested. Counties, cities, towns, and school districts, as well as the State, may impose and levy reasonable assessments, rates, and taxes upon property, but the assessment to the corporation defendants, if paid, exempts them from all other taxation for the current year.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There are a dozen cases.

Mr. DANIEL. Throughout the New England States it will be found that such decisions have been frequently made, and there is hardly a single one to the contrary.

In the bank-tax case (9 Wall., 200), 1864, a New York case, "nothing more was decided than that a tax levied under the law of the State which enacted that all banks and banking associations should be liable to taxation on a valuation equal to the amount of their capital paid in or secured to be paid in and their surplus earnings in the manner provided by law, was a tax on the property of the complaining bank, and that inasmuch as the capital of the bank consisted of public securities, declared by Congress to be exempt from taxation, the law imposing the tax was unconstitutional and void," as said in the opinion of the court in Provident Institution vs. Massachusetts (6 Wall., 629, 1867, Clifford, J.). And in the same opinion the court continued:

Express reservation of the right of the State to tax the privileges and franchises of the corporation was not made in that case, but in the case decided only one year later it was distinctly held that the States do possess the power to tax the shares of the national banks in the hands of the stockholders, although the capital of those banks is wholly invested in public securities.

Precise extent of that decision was that the shares of those banks were subject in the hands of shareholders to State taxation under the limitation provided in the forty-first section of the act of June 3, 1864, without regard to the fact that the whole of the capital was invested in the national securities declared by act of Congress to be exempt from such taxation. (Van Allen vs. Assessors, 8 Wall., 578.)

Principal reason assigned for the conclusion is that the liability to taxation is only a burden annexed to the rights and privileges granted to the corporation; but the court also held that the tax on shares was not a tax on the capital of the bank. (Queen vs. Arnaud, 9 Ad. and El. N. S., 806.)

In Schooley vs. Rew (38 Wallace 381, 1874) it was held—

1. That the succession tax imposed by acts of Congress of June 30, 1864, and July 13, 1866, on "every devolution of title to any real estate" was not a "direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution, but an impost or excise, and was constitutional and valid."

2. That a devise of an equitable interest in real estate in which personal property had been invested by the trustee with the assent of the deviser, before the making of the will, was a devolution of real estate, within the meaning of such acts, and the devisee is liable to the succession tax imposed thereby in respect to it.

Clifford, J., gave the unanimous opinion of the court—Miller,

Field, Bradley, Swayne, Davis, Strong, and Hunt—all the judges being present and uniting, and amongst other things Justice Clifford said:

Indirect taxes, such as duties of impost and excises and every other description of the same, must be uniform, and direct taxes must be laid in proportion to the census or enumeration as remodeled in the fourteenth amendment. Taxes on lands, houses, and other permanent real estate have always been deemed to be direct taxes, and capitation taxes, by the express words of the Constitution, are within the same category, but it never has been decided that any other legal exactions for the support of the Federal Government fall within the condition that unless laid in proportion to numbers that the assessment is invalid.

Whether direct taxes in the sense of the Constitution comprehend any other tax than a capitation tax and a tax on land is a question not absolutely decided, nor is it necessary to determine it in the present case, as it is expressly decided that the term does not include the tax on income, which can not be distinguished on principle from a succession tax such as the one involved in the present controversy.

Neither duties nor excises were regarded as direct taxes by the authors of the Federalist. Objection was made to the power to impose such taxes, and in answering that objection Mr. Hamilton said that the proportion of these taxes is not to be left to the discretion of the National Legislature, but it is to be determined by the numbers of each State, as described in the second section of the first article. An actual census or enumeration of the people must furnish the rule, a circumstance which shuts the door to partiality or oppression. "In addition to the precaution just mentioned," said he, "there is a provision that all duties of impost and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Exactions for the support of the Government may assume the form of duties, imposts, or excises, or they may also assume the form of license fees for permission to carry on particular occupations or to enjoy special franchises, or they may be specific in form, as when levied upon corporations in reference to the amount of capital stock or to the business done or profits earned by the individual or corporation.

In Portland Bank vs. Apthorp (12 Mass., 265, 1815) Parker, C. J.:

To lay a duty or excise upon branches of business which exist by license is no infringement of any privilege conveyed by such license.

The late law of the United States requiring the use of a license and establishing a tax to the Government seems to be predicated upon the same principle. For Congress has seen fit to require 50 per cent from tavern keepers and retailers, in addition to the sum originally paid for the license, within the term for which it was granted.

And as to corporations chartered by the Government it was held that the same doctrines applied as to individuals licensed. In the more recent case of the Commonwealth vs. Five Cents Saving Bank (5 Allen, 431) the facts were thus: In 1863 Massachusetts declared—

That every savings bank incorporated under the laws of this Commonwealth shall pay (at times specified by the statute) to the treasurer of the Commonwealth a tax on account of its depositors of one-half of 1 per cent per annum on the amount of its deposits, one-half of said annual tax on the average amount of its deposits for the six months preceding the 1st day of May, and the other on the average amount of its deposits for the six months preceding the 1st day of November.

Objection was made to the payment of this tax in this case on the same grounds urged in the former case, i. e., repugnance to the Constitution; but the court sustained the provision of the statute. The court said:

A tax imposed on the franchise of a corporation, the power and authority of which is thus limited to holding, managing, and investing property for the use and benefit of those who deposit their money in its keeping, and which has no corporate property distinct from that which they hold in special trust, and which has no stockholders or members who are interested in its profits, or who can receive dividends from its earnings, necessarily operates as an indirect assessment on those for whose use and benefit its corporate rights and privileges are granted and exercised.

The money which the corporation pays in discharge of the excise imposed on it must necessarily be deducted in due proportions from the sum which is due to each depositor. In this view, but in no other sense, it may be properly said, in the language of the statute, to be "paid on account of its depositors." To the argument drawn from the title of the act, as indicating an intention to lay a tax on depositors, so far as it is entitled to any weight, the same considerations furnish a full and decisive answer.

Certainly it is most just and reasonable that a privilege, or, to use the words of the Constitution, "a commodity," which an act of incorporation furnishes to enable depositors to reap the advantages arising from the use of large capital for investment should bear a portion of the public burdens in the form of an excise in exchange for the great benefits which are conferred on those who enjoy the use of corporate powers.

TWO SCHEMES OF TAXATION RATED BY GROSS RECEIPTS.

Now, Mr. President, it will be observed that there are two schemes of taxation rated by gross receipts, the one which I have just read and the other somewhat different. In the first scheme, which includes railroads, street railroads, sleeping cars, canals, and steamboats, ships, barges, canal boats, and other vessels, express, telephone, telegraph companies, life, fire, marine, or accident insurance, electric light, electric power, steam heat, steam power, refining petroleum, and refining sugar, the scheme of taxing gross receipts in so far as it relates to those vocations applies to individuals, firms, and corporations alike, taking the gross receipts as the basis of calculating the amount of the tax, without the exemption of any person, firm, or corporation whatsoever. The second scheme—

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). Will the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Does the scheme which the Senator has been presenting take the form of a tax upon gross receipts?

Mr. DANIEL. Not at all.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Do I understand that that is the nature of the tax?

Mr. DANIEL. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I understood the Senator had been arguing that it was a tax upon the gross receipts of these corporations, individuals, and companies.

Mr. DANIEL. The bill must speak for itself in that regard, but I will answer the Senator fully.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I supposed that a distinction was drawn.

Mr. DANIEL. It is a tax on the avocation, or the franchise, measured by the gross receipts.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It may be that the distinction is somewhat thin.

Mr. DANIEL. It is one, though, that the courts have thickened a good deal by settling it to be the correct distinction. It has been done by the Supreme Court of the United States and the supreme court of the Senator's own State time and again. So if there be anything settled in constitutional law, that thing is settled.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I can not, for the life of me, understand, Mr. President, how the taxation of gross receipts does not come within the doctrine laid down by the court in the income-tax cases.

Mr. DANIEL. On personal property.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If it be a taxation of gross receipts, if it be a taxation upon corporations as such, because they are corporations, I think it was never attempted before in this country, and I do not believe that the United States can put a tax upon all the corporations chartered by a State.

Mr. DANIEL. Well, I will leave the Senator, who is a very able and intelligent lawyer, to reconcile his differences of opinion with the mass of authority which I have quoted, and to which I could add indefinitely.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not understand that any of those authorities go to the length of holding that the Congress of the United States can impose a tax upon a corporation chartered by a State because it is a corporation.

Mr. DANIEL. How does the Senator support his own views as to the tax on banks, not State banks, in the early part of this bill, or the license of State banks?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is a tax on the business.

Mr. DANIEL. This is a tax on the business.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is just what I wanted the Senator to say—whether it is a tax on the business.

Mr. DANIEL. That is what the bill says. What I may say does not affect this measure. The committee did not report my speech. They have reported a bill. It is what the bill says which must be constitutional; but I am saying exactly what the bill does.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not understand that the bill, until it comes to the scheme of the Senator, imposes any tax upon banks, because they are corporations chartered by a State.

Mr. DANIEL. Well, bills do not generally go into explanations of themselves. The corporations are chartered by the States and they are taxed, and that is all there is of it in the one case and in the other.

Mr. SPOONER. Does not this tax individual banking as well as a corporation?

Mr. DANIEL. One provision of the bill does and one does not. I will discuss that point.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There is no taxation in the bill until it comes to the Senator's taxation that imposes a tax upon banks as banks.

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. As a license to banks.

Mr. DANIEL. It licenses the bank and measures the amount of license according to the amount of the capital, and puts the license at about one-fifth of 1 per cent of their capital. Does the Senator call that a tax upon their capital?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not.

Mr. DANIEL. Then I do not so call this tax on gross receipts either. I think he is right and that I am right.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. This is something different, however, from either.

Mr. DANIEL. Not at all.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. One is a license upon bankers, and the scheme which the Senator proposes is a tax upon corporations chartered by the State, many of which are instrumentalities of the State.

Mr. DANIEL. I understood the Senator to contend that if this was a tax on gross receipts it would be invalid under the last decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the income-tax cases, which held that a tax on an income was a direct tax on that personal property, and held, second, that if that income was derived from land it was a direct tax on the land. So the Supreme Court of the United States has held in its two decisions on the income tax, first, that a tax on income derived from land is a direct tax on land, and, second, that a tax on income, from whatever source derived, is a direct tax on that personal property, to wit, the income.

Now, then, if a tax on the exercise of the franchise of a corporation measured by its gross receipts, not on the gross receipts, is a violation of that view of the Supreme Court of the United States, I should like my honorable and intelligent friend from Connecticut to go back to the first page of this bill, where I think he will find language and doctrines which will prove much more of a judicial puzzle than the question he has just suggested. Let me read to him the following:

That from and after the passage of this act there shall be paid, in lieu of $1 now imposed by law, a tax of $2 on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquors, etc.

That is not on any franchise; that is not in terms on any avocation. That is a tax on beer as beer, moving in a direct line to the personal property from the sovereign tax-laying power of the United States. How did the Senator get over the income-tax decision at that point?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President—

Mr. DANIEL. One moment. One more question. Secondly, there is a tobacco tax. It provides:

That from and after the passage of this act there shall * * * be levied and collected a tax of 16 cents per pound upon all tobacco and snuff, however prepared, manufactured, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I suppose that the tax on beer and on tobacco is an instance of a pure excise tax, which is not a direct tax, and therefore is not subject to the objection of the decision in the income-tax cases.

Mr. DANIEL. How can you draw the distinction?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That, I suppose, was settled in the old case, where a tax was placed upon carriages. It was a greatly contested case, where it was held very early that that tax was an excise tax. I agree if you put a tax on property, it is an excise tax.

Mr. DANIEL. Of course. Why not levy an excise tax upon one species of property as well as another?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not think that this tax on corporations is an excise tax.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. LINDSAY. I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the fact that the corporation tax proposed by the bill is denominated by the bill itself an excise tax.

Mr. DANIEL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Oh, yes; it is denominated an excise tax and something else, a special excise tax, something that was never heard of in the history of taxation in the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Will one of these distinguished lawyers, members of the Committee on Finance, be kind enough to explain the constitutional distinction between an excise tax and a special excise tax?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. This is not my feature of the bill exactly. I refer the Senator to some of the authors of this feature of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Will one of the other lawyers upon the committee be kind enough to explain the distinction?

Mr. DANIEL. I can explain it to the Senator. I can not, however, guarantee that the explanation will be satisfactory to him, for I have never known an explanation to be satisfactory to everybody, but I will explain it all the same. A special excise tax is an excise tax on certain specially enumerated objects.

Mr. SPOONER. But there could not be an excise tax on something that was not enumerated.

Mr. DANIEL. That is certain which can be rendered certain. It may be enumerated by generalization or classification. It may afterwards be specialized by the terms of the generalization.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that the Senator's explanation?

Mr. DANIEL. It is such a trivial matter—

Mr. SPOONER. It is a distinction without a difference.

Mr. DANIEL. I said I did not expect to make myself satisfactory to the Senator, because he is opposing this bill on every theory that he can find in the books or invent in his imagination.

Mr. SPOONER. Not at all. The Senator has no warrant for saying that.

Mr. DANIEL. Of course I do not mean to say anything unpleasant.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not participated in this debate.

Mr. DANIEL. I thought the Senator had stated his views.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I am not a member of the Finance Committee, but I am a seeker after information, and as this is a legal question I supposed the Senator from Virginia would be able to explain it.

Mr. DANIEL. If there is anything obnoxious to the Senator's criticism in the word "special," we will take it out.

Mr. SPOONER. No; if it ought to be in it ought not to be taken out. I was simply asking the Senator from Virginia and also the Senator from Connecticut to point out the distinction from the constitutional standpoint between an excise tax and a special excise tax. Is there any?

Mr. DANIEL. We might pass it by with the remark, de minimis non curat lex. Whether you call it special or general, it is the mere use of an adjective. It is an excise tax.

Mr. SPOONER. Then there is nothing in it, is there?

Mr. DANIEL. Nothing in what?

Mr. SPOONER. In that adjective.

Mr. DANIEL. There is, to my fancy, but not to the Senator's. I think it is the levy of an excise tax on certain enumerated or classified subjects-matter. That is all. It is special in that sense on certain corporations and on certain persons not corporations, either enumerated by name or enumerated by classification, a mere descriptive phrase. The aptitude of the description is not a question of law. It is a matter of literary taste, or perhaps the casualty of literary carelessness.

Mr. SPOONER. I am so constituted that I am not able to understand—in that respect, of course, I am unfortunate—that a tax without some sort of description or designation upon the property upon which it is levied is conceivable.

Mr. DANIEL. The tax is not levied on property at all in the case of a corporation.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not talking about that. I am talking about the distinction between an excise tax and a special excise tax from a constitutional standpoint.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not know that there is any from the constitutional standpoint. The question is whether it is an excise tax or not. I use the word "special" in describing it because it specializes certain vocations either by name or by classification; that is all.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will pardon me, I was not criticizing his definition, but I was referring to the language of the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. If we were to undertake to criticize the bill with such nicety we would never get through.

Mr. RAWLINS. I should like to ask the Senator a question, with his permission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. DANIEL. I do.

Mr. RAWLINS. As to the words "special tax," I ask if that classification has not been made by all revenue laws since the foundation of our Government?

Mr. DANIEL. It is sometimes used and sometimes not, and it is entirely indifferent; it is a mere descriptive term, and the accuracy of the description is not a question of law, but it is like the label on a box, which may accurately describe or not what the box contains. The contents of the box are the main thing.

THE DIFFERENCES BETWEEN CORPORATIONS AND INDIVIDUALS IN THE LIKE BUSINESS.

Mr. President, I was going to discuss briefly, when the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] asked me some questions, the special corporate excise tax, that clause of this bill levying a tax on the franchise of certain specified corporations doing certain business, or rather upon all corporations with certain exceptions. This clause does not levy a similar special excise tax on persons engaged in the same business other than those enumerated in the next preceding section.

It is clearly, distinctly, and solely a corporation tax. It is levied upon corporations as corporations, and is not levied upon individuals who are engaged in similar business to those corporations. This has been done time and again by the Congress of the United States as to certain corporations, and in the decisions which I have quoted, and which in my remarks I will set forth more amply than I have done in the discussion simply to save time, and in the work of Mr. Cooley on the Constitution of the United States, any lawyer of this body who questions the soundness of my position will, I think, find ample response to any suggestion of objection which he may make.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LINDSAY. If the Senator will permit me, this is a very interesting question, and I should like to get a correct apprehension of my friend's theory of the measure.

Mr. DANIEL. I am going on to give it as best I can.

Mr. LINDSAY. If the Senator will permit me, I will ask only this one question and interrupt him no more. I understand the Senator to claim that this is in the nature of an excise tax levied upon the exercise of the corporate franchise?

Mr. DANIEL. That is what I claim, that it is levied upon the exercise of the corporate franchises, whether those franchises be created by foreign governments, by the Government of the United States, or by the government of any State. If we may discriminate between citizens of a State and tax the tobacco dealer and not tax the dealer in dry goods or in groceries; if we may discriminate between the productions of a State and tax the dealer in tobacco and not the dealer in wheat or corn; if we may discriminate between the vocations in a State and tax the bank, the banker, the broker, the commercial broker, the custom-house broker, and circus rider and not tax any other citizen or a corporation, so we may discriminate here; and it is the function and purpose of an excise tax so discriminating to tax those franchises in the State which we may deem it judicious to tax and leave out all others.

Mr. President, there is a great deal of difference between a corporation exercising its franchise in a certain business and a citizen exercising his natural right to pursue the same business. The right of the corporation is artificially created and legally conferred. Its personality is a fiction of law, its conferred right or privilege is called a franchise. The citizen's personality is God-given, and he has a natural, inherent right to pursue his happiness in any way that does not injure another.

Corporations may aggregate the wealth of many under their name and franchise, as individuals, in the nature of things, can not do. Corporation shareholders may shelter themselves from personal liability beyond their stock, as individuals and ordinary copartners can not do.

By the use of the corporate franchise individuals can share in its possession and get an artificial immortality conferred upon their arrangement and have perpetual succession and a common seal. If every one of them dies, the corporation still goes on. If the individual dies, his estate goes to an executor or an administrator and the business stops, but the corporation goes on in continuity. If a member of a firm dies, the firm dissolves so instantly. The business can only be wound up by the surviving partner, or continued only for self-defensive purposes. No matter who dies, the corporation goes on. It is only the corporation that can sing the song of the brook in Tennyson:

Men may come and men may go,
But I go on forever.

Mr. President, there is another advantage of a corporation. It conceals individual identity. The corporate name and privilege are given by law, and do not arise from inherent quality or from any self-achieved acquisition. Law, and law alone, gives it "a local habitation and a name." In that name it transacts business, and shelters, hides, and conceals away the names of the interested possessors.

In the next place, a corporate franchise effects residence. The members who own the corporate stock may reside in Kamschatka or in Europe. The corporation resides where the law fixes it. That may be a place where none of its members reside. The corporate charter changes the aspect of the estate held, and enables it to be transferred as personalty, whether it be real estate or no. The man who has a tenth, a fourth, or a half of the corporate stock may pass it away by the stroke of a pen, without recording a deed or assignment, although the estate represented in that stock may be altogether realty.

In some cases, and especially in the case of railroads and other public corporations, they receive gifts of a portion of the sovereignty of the State. They become the deputy sovereigns in a limited degree, and may exercise eminent domain; and in their deputed sovereignty may take the land away from its possessor by rendering to him "due compensation."

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE CORPORATIONS—ONLY PRIVATE CORPORATIONS CAN BE TAXED WITHOUT THE SOVEREIGN'S CONSENT.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, and shall not do so without his consent—

Mr. DANIEL. I shall be very glad indeed to hear the Senator.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I want to propound this question: If a railroad chartered by a State is, as suggested, in a sense a public corporation and exercises a part of the sovereign power of the State, does the Senator think the Government can lay an excise tax upon the franchise of that corporation?

Mr. DANIEL. If the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case against Coite, from Connecticut, be correct, I think it can; and I believe that it can, for this reason: The State can make the corporation no more than a freeman. It is sovereign just as the native-born free citizen is sovereign, with a certain deputed agency from the State. In the case of the Veazie Bank against Feno, before the Supreme Court, I know there was contention, and that the minority of the Supreme Court held that as to a bank of circulation, in so far as it was a State agency and might be necessary to the State government, the Congress of the United States could not levy an excise tax rated by its circulation—the very question which the Senator suggests to me. It is difficult, as I recognize, to answer that question in all its aspects.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But does not the Senator think—

Mr. DANIEL. I hope the Senator will allow me to get through first, and then I shall answer him.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. It is not easy to answer the question in all its aspects. It presents one of the nicest points of constitutional law. My answer to the Senator, however, would be that the Supreme Court of the United States has in reiterated decisions held that Congress could so tax the corporate institution of a State.

I would further answer the Senator by this observation, that only a few of those corporations that are taxed are corporations of that class, and that, even if it were held as he suggests, and if the decisions of the Supreme Court were overridden and reviewed, the great mass of this taxation on other subjects would still be good, for it applies to private corporations only.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President—

Mr. DANIEL. And further, if the Senator will permit me to answer him—I do not wish my answer to be cut in two—the trend of judicial decision, indeed, I believe the well-nigh, if not completely, unanimous decision in this country is, that while railroads and other corporations of that character may receive the delegated powers of a sovereign State for certain purposes on account of their public relation and of their great utility to the public, nevertheless they are not public corporations; they are private corporations, and the principle which confines the taxation of the United States to private subjects-matter and excludes it from grasping those matters which relate to automatic functions of the State has never been held to include railroads, because they are held to be private and not public corporations. Only those corporations are designated as public corporations which exercise from day to day governmental functions.

The State itself is a public corporation, the counties, towns, shires, the districts, townships, the magisterial divisions, the school divisions, or what not have a continuous daily governmental public agency with relation to the people. Only those are public corporations; and every other corporation in the United States is a private corporation; and, as such, is subject to the same taxation as a private individual.

So, if the Senator is troubled on the subject of this bill by constitutional qualms, he will find upon investigating the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the courts of the great body of the States of this Union that all of them have long since been set at rest, and that the habitual practice of Congress has been, whenever it desired to do so, to tax railroads, banks, and all the subsidiary corporations of the States, just as it would tax individuals.

THE TAX IS ON THE CORPORATE FRANCHISE, HOWEVER MEASURED AS TO AMOUNT.

He will find, also, that the tax upon corporations, whether it be measured by the amount of the corporate capital or the corporate income or the corporate dividends or the corporate stock or the net receipts or the gross receipts, is in each and every instance considered by the courts to be a tax upon the franchise of the corporation and not upon the property, although it must be collected finally out of the property, as you can not get a tax out of nothing; but that the tax is upon the exercise of the functions, just as it is upon a lawyer for the practice of his profession, upon a physician for the practice of his profession, upon a dentist, upon a manufacturer, or upon anyone else in business, and the reference to dividends, incomes, earnings, increments, rents, stock, and all of those things is a mere mathematical relation for measurement, and not a direct tax upon the property so measured.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I may be mistaken, but I had supposed this was the first time in the history of our Government when Congress had attempted to lay a tax upon the franchise of a State corporation, and I did not know—perhaps it is my ignorance—that the courts, where Congress had laid a tax upon the property of corporations, had held that that was a tax upon the franchise.

Mr. DANIEL. Under the decision which the Senator has himself just referred to Congress can not levy a tax upon the property of corporations without it being a direct tax. It was the income-tax decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Pollock vs. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (127 U. S., 429, and 128 U. S., 601), that you can not levy a direct tax on either real or personal property; but a multitude of other cases have settled it that you can levy taxes upon the exercise of any vocation, profession, or franchise, and the Senator's explanation of the tobacco tax which he gave a while ago is not the one that I would give.

If that tax was intended to be, as it expresses itself, a tax on tobacco, it would be obnoxious to both decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the first place, it would be a direct tax on personal property; in the second place, it would be a tax on the real estate, because tobacco is an issue and product of the land, much more so than the income from rent is, because the tobacco is physically extracted out of the land; and it would be a direct tax on real estate, under the doctrine enunciated by the Supreme Court in its first decision, that a tax on that which comes out of the land is a tax on the land.

But, while the language of this bill is such as one would infer from it that it was a direct tax on the tobacco and void under both decisions of the Supreme Court, I take it that when it comes to be defended they will say that while it is mentioned as a tax on tobacco the tax is such that it shows that the mind of Congress was directing itself to the tax on the manufacture and sale of tobacco measured by 6 cents a pound on tobacco or 16 cents, as the case may be.

The Senator will find that in the drafting of the clauses of this bill as to excise taxes on corporations and persons, there is no tax on gross receipts, but a tax on the corporation, which shall be "equivalent" to a certain percentage of gross receipts, showing that they are used as the measure of the tax and not as the subject-matter of the tax, which is the franchise.

I need not, however, explain these distinctions further, Mr. President. I am not stating any novel creed. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Law, has collated the cases fully and explained them.

THE EXCISE TAX WOULD BE LARGE IN AMOUNT, BUT THE EXACT AMOUNT NOT ASCERTAINABLE.

Now, Mr. President, I wish I could state what this tax would raise. I can not. I have examined the books and periodicals in which I might have hoped to find information, but the librarians and the clerks tell me that gross receipts reports are very seldom made, and that the corporations generally do not like the public to know what they are.

With respect to the railways, I can give the information that in 1896, according to the Eleventh Annual Report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the receipts were $1,130,169,376, and that in 1897 the receipts were $1,116,613,254, and that in 1897 the income was $369,050,858. So that here a little over a billion dollars of gross receipts may be imputed to the railroads; and the tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent would be something over two and a half million dollars. It is a very small tax. It ought to be willingly paid. It ought to be cheerfully paid.

The corporations of this country ought to be gratified that Congress has given them an opportunity to support the Government and to uphold the hands of the President, to cheer the hearts of our soldiers by their ready response to a patriotic duty to support the Government which has given them such splendid opportunities to accumulate their fortunes, and to have opened up to them the vast national field of commercial advantage. If I were a railroad man, Mr. President, I would delight to pay that little contribution to the Government of the United States.

The railroads are more dependent upon the Government of the United States than any other portion of our people. They call for the standing Army to protect them. I voted upon this floor to sustain the President of the United States when the lines of interstate commerce were assailed at Chicago, against the disposition and against the opinion of many of my political colleagues elsewhere—I do not mean upon this floor. I believed it was right, Democracy and good citizenship have no sympathy with anarchy anywhere.

The man who raises the torch of arson or the dagger of the assassin is the enemy of the human race. But, Mr. President, if property is respected and protected by Government, and if that Government calls on me in return to come and stand by it, one should feel as much humiliated by refusal to meet a just demand as if guilty of cowardice in the face of an enemy upon the field of battle. Mr. President, this opens up to the Government of the United States a large revenue with little burden upon the masses of its people. It goes where wealth is heaped up in largest masses and where it will least miss the trivial stipend which is asked of it.

Look at the street railways of the United States. Why shall they not pay something to support this great Government? I do not know their returns for last year, but I have an extract from the report on the transportation business from the census of 1890, page 21. There it is shown that the receipts of the street cars were $91,721,844.74, nearly $100,000,000, almost ten years ago, and there is this comment made:

In this statement it appears that steam passenger railways show the largest per cent of net earnings. This is due solely to the very profitable character of the traffic of the elevated railways in New York City and Brooklyn. For example, the per cent of net earnings in the case of the Manhattan Elevated Railroad Company, which controls the lines of New York City, is 47.83 per cent.

Committees want to find those who are most able to support the Government. Could they not find somebody in the Manhattan Elevated Railroad, which is making an earning of nearly 50 per cent? So all these great concerns have derived very great advantages from the law which created them; and if they seek to avoid this tax, they have forgotten their creator in the hour of need and go back upon the author of their being in refusing to bear a small portion of public burden.

Mr. President, I have never participated with those who have indulged in general denunciation against corporations. I do not sympathize with them. The people of this country have shown great favor to corporations. They have demonstrated that fact, because you can not pick up a book of legislative enactments of any year of almost any State of this Union which is not sprinkled over with corporate charters and franchises; and if the people had not favored corporations they would not have continuously granted these privileges.

THE CORPORATE EXCISE TAX A FAIR RETURN FOR FAVORS GRANTED.

But the people have a right to ask a just return for what they grant. They ought not to be exorbitant. They ought to respect the vested rights and charters and franchises which they themselves have created. They should not tolerate or stimulate a general and indiscriminate oburgation and criticism. But it should be remembered that the corporation is the great agent of modern business.

It associates capital; it economizes the main costs of administration; it protects private estates from being wrecked in a single venture; it apportions the burden and opportunities of the community in equitable, mechanical, and wise fashion. They should make their fair response to the government both of the State and of the nation, and they should step forward to help to shelter the masses of the people from vexations and irritating taxes in their daily concerns. If it is thought that the tax discriminates against corporate charters, it can be avoided by giving up the charter and conducting the business as individuals conduct it.

These corporations, too, for the most part, Mr. President, it should be remembered, will receive advantages from war. Many of them will execute great contracts for the Government. Many of them will make money in the transportation of troops, provisions, supplies; in constructing ships, and in manufacturing arms and munitions of war. None of them are called on to render military service. No corporation dedicates its son to the God of battles and suffers that agony for those beloved which no money or reward can ever solace. Separated, then, by their legal constitution and the nature of their being from many of the burdens that bear upon the person and from many of the duties and obligations which are exacted from the person, they should cheerfully, eagerly bear that little portion of burden which they are asked to contribute to support our country in the solemn travail of war.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will sustain the amendment. Some heads of great corporations have expressed themselves to me as heartily approving of it; others, I know, dissent, but I believe that the great body of the people will approve it; that it will give us revenue, promptly and easily collected, and that it is the part of wisdom and of patriotism to sustain it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY] to the amendment of the committee. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, line 21, after the word "shareholders," it is proposed to insert:

Limited liability commercial partnerships, or corporations, and companies or corporations of limited liability conducting planting or farming business, or preparing for market products of the soil.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood it would suit the convenience of Senators on the other side if these sections and the amendments to them were passed over for the present, and that we might go on perhaps with the reading of the amendment of the committee on page 66. Unless some Senator desires to speak upon this provision—

Mr. COCKRELL. Had we not better have the amendment read, notwithstanding we may not act upon it now?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it was read yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment was read yesterday.

Mr. ALDRICH. Amendment No. 177 was read through yesterday.

Mr. COCKRELL. All the amendments ought to be read through.

Mr. McENERY rose.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg pardon of the Senator from Louisiana. I did not understand that he desired to speak upon his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McENERY. Mr. President, the section proposing a tax upon corporations, it seems to me, includes every corporation that ought to be taxed. Every corporation capable of yielding a tax and known to be in existence is mentioned in the section. The last section, imposing a tax on all other corporations—those which have escaped the attention of the committee—necessarily includes a vast number of small corporations that are unable to bear such an imposition, such as corporations engaged in commercial business, known as limited companies, and those which are engaged in farming and planting interests and also known as limited companies. I doubt very much whether under a proper construction of the section these companies could be properly classed as corporations, but I understood from the remarks of the chairman of the committee that it embraces all conceivable kinds of corporations, every association that has a semblance of a corporation, and as these associations or companies have some of the features of corporations, but are lacking in many essential features of being corporations, I think the amendment ought to be adopted exempting them from this tax.

They are corporations only in name and not in fact. They have perpetual existence, it is true, and they were organized for the purpose of convenience, in order, if they saw fit to do so, that they could conduct business through the officers usually known to corporations. But the several acts in the States authorizing the formation of these corporations had a greater object in view. They were intended to invite capital to be invested in business, so that those investing should not be liable for more than the amount of their investment. It was the intention of continuing commercial and manufacturing enterprises, so that when a partner died it did not necessarily involve the dissolution of the firm and the deceased partner's business could be kept in active operation.

They are organized as companies such as these, for instance: Finlay, Dicks & Co., importers, wholesale druggists, and manufacturing chemists; Whitney & Sloo Company, Limited, saddlery, harness, and collars. They do a business exactly like any other commercial partnership in the same business, having no advantage over them, and therefore to tax them would be to impose a hardship upon them and to make them bear a burden that a company doing the same business, and probably a great deal more, would not have to bear. For that reason I ask for the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Unless some other Senator desires to speak upon the proposition I ask that these sections and amendments to them may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the course suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island? The Chair hears none, and that course will be pursued. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 66, after line 13, to insert the following:

LEGACIES AND DISTRIBUTIVE SHARES OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.

SEC. —. That any person or persons having in charge or trust, as administrators, executors, or trustees, any legacies or distributive shares arising from personal property, where the whole amount of such personal property as aforesaid shall exceed the sum of $5,000 in actual value, passing, after the passage of this act, from any person possessed of such property, either by will or by the intestate laws of any State or Territory, or any personal property or interest therein, transferred by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift, made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor or bargainer, to any person or persons, or to any body or bodies, politic or corporate, in trust or otherwise, shall be, and hereby are, made subject to a duty or tax, to be paid to the United States, as follows—that is to say: Where the whole amount of said personal property shall exceed in value five thousand and shall not exceed in value the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars the tax shall be:

First. Where the person or persons entitled to any beneficial interest in such property shall be the lineal issue or lineal ancestor, brother, or sister to the person who died possessed of such property, as aforesaid, at the rate of 75 cents for each and every hundred dollars of the clear value of such interest in such property.

Second. Where the person or persons entitled to any beneficial interest in such property shall be the descendant of a brother or sister of the person who died possessed, as aforesaid, at the rate of $1.50 for each and every hundred dollars of the clear value of such interest.

Third. Where the person or persons entitled to any beneficial interest in such property shall be the brother or sister of the father or mother, or a descendant of a brother or sister of the father or mother, of the person who died possessed as aforesaid, at the rate of $3 for each and every hundred dollars of the clear value of such interest.

Fourth. Where the person or persons entitled to any beneficial interest in such property shall be the brother or sister of the grandfather or grandmother, or a descendant of the brother or sister of the grandfather or grandmother, of the person who died possessed as aforesaid, at the rate of $4 for each and every hundred dollars of the clear value of such interest.

Fifth. Where the person or persons entitled to any beneficial interest in such property shall be in any other degree of collateral consanguinity than is hereinbefore stated, or shall be a stranger in blood to the person who died possessed, as aforesaid, or shall be a body politic or corporate, at the rate of $5 for each and every hundred dollars of the clear value of such interest: Provided, That all legacies or property passing by will, or by the laws of any State or Territory, to husband or wife of the person died possessed, as aforesaid, shall be exempt from tax or duty.

Where the amount or value of said property shall exceed the sum of $35,000, but shall not exceed the sum or value of $100,000, the rates of duty or tax above set forth shall be multiplied by 1½; and where the amount or value of said property shall exceed the sum of $100,000, but shall not exceed the sum of $500,000, such rates of duty shall be multiplied by 2; and where the amount or value of said property shall exceed the sum of $500,000, but shall not exceed the sum of $1,000,000, such rates of duty shall be multiplied by 2½; and where the amount or value of said property shall exceed the sum of $1,000,000, such rates of duty shall be multiplied by 3.

SEC. —. That the tax or duty aforesaid shall be a lien and charge upon the property of every person who may die as aforesaid for twenty years, or until the same shall, within that period, be fully paid to and discharged by the United States; and every executor, administrator, or trustee, before payment and distribution to the legatees, or any parties entitled to beneficial interest therein, shall pay to the collector or deputy collector of the district of which the deceased person was a resident the amount of the duty or tax assessed upon such legacy or distributive share, and shall also make and render to the said collector or deputy collector a schedule, list, or statement, in duplicate, of the amount of such legacy or distributive share, together with the amount of duty which has accrued, or shall accrue, thereon, verified by his oath or affirmation, to be administered and certified thereon by some magistrate or officer having lawful power to administer such oaths, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which schedule, list, or statement shall contain the names of each and every person entitled to any beneficial interest therein, together with the clear value of such interest, the duplicate of which schedule, list, or statement shall be by him immediately delivered, and the tax thereon paid to such collector; and upon such payment and delivery of such schedule, list, or statement said collector or deputy collector shall grant to such person paying such duty or tax a receipt or receipts for the same in duplicate, which shall be prepared as hereinafter provided. Such receipt or receipts, duly signed and delivered by such collector or deputy collector, shall be sufficient evidence to entitle such executor, administrator, or trustee to be credited and allowed such payment by every tribunal which, by the laws of any State or Territory, is, or may be, empowered to decide upon and settle the accounts of executors and administrators. And in case such executor, administrator, or trustee shall refuse or neglect to pay the aforesaid duty or tax to the collector or deputy collector, as aforesaid, within the time hereinbefore provided, or shall neglect or refuse to deliver to said collector or deputy collector the duplicate of the schedule, list, or statement of such legacies, property, or personal estate, under oath, as aforesaid, or shall neglect or refuse to deliver the schedule, list, or statement of such legacies, property, or personal estate, under oath, as aforesaid, or shall deliver to said collector or deputy collector a false schedule or statement of such legacies, property, or personal estate, or give the names and relationship of the persons entitled to beneficial interests therein untruly, or shall not truly and correctly set forth and state therein the clear value of such beneficial interest, or where no administration upon such property or personal estate shall have been granted or allowed under existing laws, the collector or deputy collector shall make out such lists and valuation as in other cases of neglect or refusal, and shall assess the duty thereon; and the collector shall commence appropriate proceedings before any court of the United States, in the name of the United States, against such person or persons as may have the actual or constructive custody or possession of such property or personal estate, or any part thereof, and shall subject such property or personal estate, or any portion of the same, to be sold upon the judgment or decree of such court, and from the proceeds of such sale the amount of such tax or duty, together with all costs and expenses of every description to be allowed by such court, shall be first paid, and the balance, if any, deposited according to the order of such court, to be paid under its direction to such person or persons as shall establish title to the same. The deed or deeds, or any proper conveyance of such property or personal estate, or any portion thereof, so sold under such judgment or decree, executed by the officer lawfully charged with carrying the same into effect, shall vest in the purchaser thereof all the title of the delinquent to the property or personal estate sold under and by virtue of such judgment or decree, and shall release every other portion of such property or personal estate from the lien or charge thereon created by this act. And every person or persons who shall have in his possession, charge, or custody any record, file, or paper containing, or supposed to contain, any information concerning such property or personal estate, as aforesaid, passing from any person who may die, as aforesaid, shall exhibit the same at the request of the collector or deputy collector of the district, and to any law officer of the United States, in the performance of his duty under this act, his deputy or agent, who may desire to examine the same. And if any such person, having in his possession, charge, or custody any such records, files, or papers, shall refuse or neglect to exhibit the same on request, as aforesaid, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of $500: Provided, That in all legal controversies where such deed or title shall be the subject of judicial investigation, the record in said deed shall be prima facie evidence of its truth, and that the requirements of the law had been complied with by the officers of the Government.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it seems to me from the reading of the section or sections which relate to succession taxes that there is raised the same question of constitutional power on the part of Congress to enact a law to collect such taxes as was raised in the course of the argument of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] to the power of Congress to levy a tax upon the franchise of a corporation, for this tax is a tax upon personal property, and I suppose upon real property.

Mr. CHILTON. No; not real property.

Mr. MORGAN. Entirely on personal property. It is a tax which by this proposed statute is made a lien upon the real estate and also upon the personal estate of a decedent. Therefore it might possibly be argued by some one who wanted to escape the tax and was very adroit in his efforts to do so that inasmuch as this tax was to be paid out of the income of real estate or out of the real estate itself under the pressure of a lien, therefore it fell within the denouncement of the Supreme Court against the ten sections in which were contained the income tax under what was known as the Wilson Act.

I think the Senator from Virginia made it very clear; in fact, I have no doubt of the power of Congress to impose a tax upon the franchise and to measure that tax by the income of the corporation from whatever source the income may be derived. But I rose to call the attention of the committee to one thing. I see very few members of the committee at present in the Chamber, but some of them are here. I desire to ask whether they have considered the question whether any part of the income-tax law, under the act which went into effect without the President's approval, I think, on the 18th day of August, 1894, or some such date, having been passed on the 15th of August, is still in force? They seem not to have given any attention to the question as to how far that tax may still be in force and collectible, and the present bill has no reference at all, apparently, to that provision of the law except to regard it as being unconstitutional in all of its aspects and in every possible application of it.

I must, Mr. President, take issue with any such construction of the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Pollock vs. The Farmers' Loan and Trust Company. I understand the decision of the Supreme Court in that case to be necessarily and properly confined to the particular case or to the particular class of cases which were brought under review by that appeal; and if there are any other classes of cases in which taxation has been imposed upon persons or upon property which are not within the range of that opinion, necessarily the whole subject remains open. It seems to have been an almost conceded fact, at which I feel somewhat surprised, that the Dingley tariff act repealed those clauses of the Wilson Act.

Just toward the close of the extra session, as we call it, the first session of this Congress, when we were discussing the subject of the disagreements between the two Houses on the Dingley bill, I called the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who is also a distinguished member of the Committee on Finance, to the proposition that the Republican party had not undertaken to repeal those ten sections of the Wilson Act.

I desire to demonstrate that and to put the demonstration in the RECORD, so that those Senators who are most concerned, considering the state of the law as it now is and as it ought to be made by this bill or by such amendments as we may choose to adopt to the statutes as they exist, may look into the question and give us the light and benefit of their opinions upon it. In section 34 of what is termed the Dingley Act, approved July 24, 1897, there is this provision:

That sections 1 to 24, both inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," which became a law on the 28th day of August, 1894, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, said repeal to take effect on and after the passage of this act.

There are twenty-four sections, the first twenty-four sections of the act, repealed. That is all of this law which we repealed, except such parts of it as are inconsistent with the act of the 24th day of July, 1897. In the concluding section of the act I am reading from—the act of July 24, 1897—there is the following proviso:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or in any manner affect the sections numbered 73, 74, 75, 76, and 77 of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," which became a law on the 28th day of August, 1894.

There is the whole breadth and scope of the repealing clause of the act of July 24, 1897. It leaves all the clauses of the Wilson Act unrepealed from section 25 to section 77, inclusive. All of that body of law stands here to-day not only unrepealed by the Dingley Act, but reenacted by the Dingley Act, for the reason that having it before them they refused expressly to repeal it, and left it to stand for what it was worth on the legislative records of the United States.

Now, what does all this amount to? Well, Mr. President, it amounts to a very great deal when you come to analyze those ten sections of the income tax, and I think no lawyer would risk his reputation in a half dozen cases that could be made upon the ten sections of the income tax by saying that the decision in the Pollock case covered those provisions. I will refer to one here. First, however, I will take the syllabus; I will not undertake to read the whole opinion, although the syllabus is very much broader than the decision. I will take the third proposition in the syllabus.

3. The tax imposed by sections 27-37, inclusive, of the act of 1894, so far as it falls on the income of real estate and of personal property—being a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution, and therefore unconstitutional and void, because not apportioned according to representation, all those sections, constituting one entire scheme of taxation, are necessarily invalid.

That last part of it is what the court never said. The reporter said that all those sections constituting one scheme of taxation are necessarily invalid. The court never said that. They never decided it, and they could not have decided it.

For the purpose of giving point to the matter I have in hand and desire to state, I will call the attention of the Senate to section 83 of the act of August 27, 1894, which remained unrepealed. It is as follows:

SEC. 83. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all salaries of officers, or payments for services to persons in the civil, military, naval, or other employment or service of the United States, including Senators and Representatives and Delegates in Congress, when exceeding the rate of $4,000 per annum, a tax of 2 per cent on the excess above the said $4,000; and it shall be the duty of all paymasters and all disbursing officers under the Government of the United States, or persons in the employ thereof, when making any payment to any officers or persons as aforesaid, whose compensation is determined by a fixed salary, or upon settling or adjusting the accounts of such officers or persons, to deduct and withhold the aforesaid tax of 2 per cent; and the pay roll, receipts, or account of officers or persons paying such tax as aforesaid shall be made to exhibit the fact of such payment. And it shall be the duty of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, when auditing the accounts of any paymaster or disbursing officer, or any officer withholding his salary from moneys received by him, or when settling or adjusting the accounts of any such officer, to require evidence that the taxes mentioned in this section have been deducted and paid over to the Treasurer of the United States, or other officer authorized to receive the same. Every corporation which pays to any employee a salary or compensation exceeding $4,000 dollars per annum shall report the same to the collector or deputy collector of his district and said employee shall pay thereon, subject to the exemptions herein provided for, the tax of 2 per cent on the excess of his salary over $4,000: Provided, That salaries due to State, county, or municipal officers shall be exempt from the income tax herein levied.

Now, let me ask the Senate how much of the salary of a military officer or a civil officer in the service of the United States falls on the income of real estate and personal property? Not one particle of it. That tax, standing unrepealed on the statute book to-day, is as valid as any tax on the statute book, it being shown that it not only has not been repealed, but it stands entirely outside of the decision of Pollock vs. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company.

Mr. President, there are half a dozen different taxes here of the same sort, already provided for by law, which the officers of the law are required under their oath to go on and collect. Here we are legislating about taxation of the people, entirely overlooking and entirely allowing to escape this source of revenue fixed by law, that not only is unrepealed, but which the Republican party did not have the temerity and the audacity to attempt to repeal when they passed the Dingley bill. I called attention to it at the time. I said, "You are allowing this income tax to stand here on the statute book, and here is your decision of the Supreme Court that many of you say invalidates that tax altogether." The subject went off sub silentio, except the few feeble remarks I made about it, and it stands here in the statute book to-day, not merely justified by Democratic action, repeated and affirmed by Republican action, but also justified by the decision of the Supreme Court as being a tax to which we have the right to resort to now in this time of war, or had the right to resort to even in time of peace.

I wish to put in the RECORD those eleven sections, sections 27 to 37, inclusive, and then I wish to put in the RECORD the section of the Dingley Act which does not repeal those sections, but leaves them to stand. I will put in section 34 in solidio, in order that by a comparison of that repealing clause with these sections of the income-tax law, and then a comparison of both with the decision in the Pollock case, it may be seen that we have still a large number of resources of taxation which we have nothing to do in order to collect except to command the officers of the law that they shall collect the tax.

Mr. STEWART. I suggest to the Senator to put in enough of the decision so that the whole matter can be studied together.

Mr. MORGAN. I will put in the syllabus, which is broader than the decision itself, giving fuller weight to the syllabus than it is entitled to, in order that the point may be made conspicuously clear.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which became a law August 28, 1894.]

SEC. 27. That from and after the 1st day of January, 1895, and until the 1st day of January, 1900, there shall be assessed, levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income received in the preceding calendar year by every citizen of the United States, whether residing at home or abroad, and every person residing therein, whether said gains, profits, or income be derived from any kind of property, rents, interests, dividends, or salaries, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever, a tax of 2 per cent on the amount so derived over and above $4,000, and a like tax shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income from all property owned and of every business, trade, or profession carried on in the United States by persons residing without the United States. And the tax herein provided for shall be assessed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and collected, and paid upon the gains, profits, and income for the year ending the 31st day of December next preceding the time for levying, collecting, and paying said tax.

SEC. 28. That in estimating the gains, profits, and income of any person there shall be included all income derived from interest upon notes, bonds, and other securities, except such bonds of the United States the principal and interest of which are by the law of their issuance exempt from all Federal taxation; profits realized within the year from sales of real estate purchased within two years previous to the close of the year for which income is estimated; interest received or accrued upon all notes, bonds, mortgages, or other forms of indebtedness bearing interest, whether paid or not, if good and collectible, less the interest which has become due from said person or which has been paid by him during the year; the amount of all premium on bonds, notes, or coupons; the amount of sales of live stock, sugar, cotton, wool, butter, cheese, pork, beef, mutton, or other meats, hay, and grain, or other vegetable or other productions, being the growth or produce of the estate of such person, less the amount expended in the purchase or production of said stock or produce, and not including any part thereof consumed directly by the family; money and the value of all personal property acquired by gift or inheritance; all other gains, profits, and income derived from any source whatever except that portion of the salary, compensation, or pay received for services in the civil, military, naval, or other service of the United States, including Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, from which the tax has been deducted, and except that portion of any salary upon which the employer is required by law to withhold, and does withhold the tax and pays the same to the officer authorized to receive it. In computing incomes the necessary expenses actually incurred in carrying on any business, occupation, or profession shall be deducted and also all interest due or paid within the year by such person on existing indebtedness. And all national, State, county, school, and municipal taxes, not including those assessed against local benefits, paid within the year shall be deducted from the gains, profits, or income of the person who has actually paid the same, whether such person be owner, tenant, or mortgagor; also losses actually sustained during the year, incurred in trade or arising from fires, storms, or shipwreck, and not compensated for by insurance or otherwise, and debts ascertained to be worthless, but excluding all estimated depreciation of values and losses within the year on sales of real estate purchased within two years previous to the year for which income is estimated: Provided, That no deduction shall be made for any amount paid out for new buildings, permanent improvements, or betterments, made to increase the value of any property or estate: Provided further, That only one deduction of $4,000 shall be made from the aggregate income of all the members of any family, composed of one or both parents, and one or more minor children, or husband and wife; that guardians shall be allowed to make a deduction in favor of each and every ward, except that in case where two or more wards are comprised in one family, and have joint property interests, the aggregate deduction in their favor shall not exceed $4,000: And provided further, That in cases where the salary or other compensation paid to any person in the employment or service of the United States shall not exceed the rate of $4,000 per annum, or shall be by fees, or uncertain or irregular in the amount or in the time during which the same shall have accrued or been earned, such salary or other compensation shall be included in estimating the annual gains, profits, or income of the person to whom the same shall have been paid, and shall include that portion of any income or salary upon which a tax has not been paid by the employer, where the employer is required by law to pay on the excess over $4,000: Provided, also, That in computing the income of any person, corporation, company, or association there shall not be included the amount received from any corporation, company, or association as dividends upon the stock of such corporation, company, or association if the tax of 2 per cent has been paid upon its net profits by said corporation, company, or association as required by this act.

SEC. 29. That it shall be the duty of all persons of lawful age having an income of more than $3,500 for the taxable year, computed on the basis herein prescribed, to make and render a list or return, on or before the day provided by law, in such form and manner as may be directed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the collector or a deputy collector of the district in which they reside, of the amount of their income, gains, and profits, as aforesaid; and all guardians and trustees, executors, administrators, agents, receivers, and all persons or corporations acting in any fiduciary capacity, shall make and render a list or return, as aforesaid, to the collector or a deputy collector of the district in which such person or corporation acting in a fiduciary capacity resides or does business, of the amount of income, gains, and profits of any minor or person for whom they act, but persons having less than $3,500 income are not required to make such report; and the collector or deputy collector shall require every list or return to be verified by the oath or affirmation of the party rendering it, and may increase the amount of any list or return if he has reason to believe that the same is understated; and in case any such person having a taxable income shall neglect or refuse to make and render such list and return, or shall render a willfully false or fraudulent list or return, it shall be the duty of the collector or deputy collector to make such list, according to the best information he can obtain, by the examination of such person, or any other evidence, and to add 50 per cent as a penalty to the amount of the tax due on such list in all cases of willful neglect or refusal to make and render a list or return; and in all cases of a willfully false or fraudulent list or return having been rendered to add 100 per cent as a penalty to the amount of tax ascertained to be due, the tax and the additions thereto as a penalty to be assessed and collected in the manner provided for in other cases of willful neglect or refusal to render a list or return, or of rendering a false or fraudulent return: Provided, That any person or corporation in his, her, or its own behalf, or as such fiduciary, shall be permitted to declare, under oath or affirmation, the form and manner of which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, that he, she, or his or her, or its ward or beneficiary, was not possessed of an income of $4,000, liable to be assessed according to the provisions of this act; or may declare that he, she, or it, or his, her, or its ward or beneficiary has been assessed and has paid an income tax elsewhere in the same year, under authority of the United States, upon all his, her, or its income, gains, or profits, and upon all the income, gains, or profits for which he, she, or it is liable as such fiduciary, as prescribed by law; and if the collector or deputy collector shall be satisfied of the truth of the declaration, such person or corporation shall thereupon be exempt from income tax in the said district for that year; or if the list or return of any person or corporation, company, or association shall have been increased by the collector or deputy collector, such person or corporation, company, or association may be permitted to prove the amount of income liable to be assessed; but such proof shall not be considered as conclusive of the facts, and no deductions claimed in such cases shall be made or allowed until approved by the collector or deputy collector. Any person or corporation, company, or association feeling aggrieved by the decision of the deputy collector, in such cases may appeal to the collector of the district, and his decision thereon, unless reversed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be final. If dissatisfied with the decision of the collector such person or corporation, company, or association may submit the case, with all the papers, to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for his decision, and may furnish the testimony of witnesses to prove any relevant facts, having served notice to that effect upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as herein prescribed.

Such notice shall state the time and place at which, and the officer before whom, the testimony will be taken; the name, age, residence, and business of the proposed witness, with the questions to be propounded to the witness, or a brief statement of the substance of the testimony he is expected to give: Provided, That the Government may at the same time and place take testimony upon like notice to rebut the testimony of the witnesses examined by the person taxed.

The notice shall be delivered or mailed to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a sufficient number of days previous to the day fixed for taking the testimony to allow him, after its receipt, at least five days, exclusive of the period required for mail communication with the place at which the testimony is to be taken, in which to give, should he so desire, instructions as to the cross-examination of the proposed witness.

Whenever practicable, the affidavit or deposition shall be taken before a collector or deputy collector of internal revenue, in which case reasonable notice shall be given to the collector or deputy collector of the time fixed for taking the deposition or affidavit.

Provided further, That no penalty shall be assessed upon any person or corporation, company, or association for such neglect or refusal or for making or rendering a willfully false or fraudulent return, except after reasonable notice of the time and place of hearing, to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue so as to give the person charged an opportunity to be heard.

SEC. 30. The taxes on incomes herein imposed shall be due and payable on or before the 1st day of July in each year; and to any sum or sums annually due and unpaid after the 1st day of July as aforesaid, and for ten days after notice and demand thereof by the collector, there shall be levied, in addition thereto, the sum of 5 per cent on the amount of taxes unpaid and interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month upon said tax from the time the same becomes due, as a penalty, except from the estates of deceased, insane, or insolvent persons.

SEC. 31. Any nonresident may receive the benefit of the exemptions herein before provided for by filing with the deputy collector of any district a true list of all his property and sources of income in the United States and complying with the provisions of section 29 of this act as if a resident. In computing income he shall include all income from every source, but unless he be a citizen of the United States he shall only pay on that part of the income which is derived from any source in the United States. In case such nonresident fails to file such statement, the collector of each district shall collect the tax on the income derived from property situated in his district, subject to income tax, making no allowance for exemptions, and all property belonging to such nonresident shall be liable to distraint for tax: Provided, That nonresident corporations shall be subject to the same laws as to tax as resident corporations, and the collection of the tax shall be made in the same manner as provided for collections of taxes against nonresident persons.

SEC. 82. That there shall be assessed, levied, and collected, except as herein otherwise provided, a tax of 2 per cent annually on the net profits or income above actual operating and business expenses, including expenses for materials purchased for manufacture or bought for resale, losses, and interest on bonded and other indebtedness of all banks, banking institutions, trust companies, saving institutions, fire, marine, life, and other insurance companies, railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation, slack-water, telephone, telegraph, express, electric-light, gas, water, street-railway companies, and all other corporations, companies, or associations doing business for profit in the United States, no matter how created and organized, but not including partnerships.

That said tax shall be paid on or before the 1st day of July in each year; and if the president or other chief officer of any corporation, company, or association, or in the case of any foreign corporation, company, or association, the resident manager or agent, shall neglect or refuse to file with the collector of the internal-revenue district in which said corporation, company, or association shall be located or be engaged in business, a statement verified by his oath or affirmation, in such form as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the amount of net profits or income received by said corporation, company, or association during the whole calendar year last preceding the date of filing said statement as hereinafter required, the corporation, company, or association making default shall forfeit as a penalty the sum of $1,000 and 2 per cent on the amount of taxes due, for each month until the same is paid, the payment of said penalty to be enforced as provided in other cases of neglect and refusal to make return of taxes under the internal-revenue laws.

The net profits or income of all corporations, companies, or associations shall include the amounts paid to shareholders, or carried to the account of any fund, or used for construction, enlargement of plant, or any other expenditure or investment paid from the net annual profits made or acquired by said corporations, companies, or associations.

That nothing herein contained shall apply to States, counties, or municipalities; nor to corporations, companies, or associations organized and conducted solely for charitable, religious, or educational purposes, including fraternal beneficiary societies, orders, or associations operating upon the lodge system and providing for the payment of life, sick, accident, and other benefits to the members of such societies, orders, or associations and dependents of such members; nor to the stocks, shares, funds, or securities held by any fiduciary or trustee for charitable, religious, or educational purposes; nor to building and loan associations or companies which make loans only to their shareholders; nor to such savings banks, savings institutions or societies as shall, first, have no stockholders or members except depositors and no capital except deposits; secondly, shall not receive deposits to an aggregate amount, in any one year, of more than $1,000 from the same depositor; thirdly, shall not allow an accumulation or total of deposits, by any one depositor, exceeding $10,000; fourthly, shall actually divide and distribute to its depositors, ratably to deposits, all the earnings over the necessary and proper expenses of such bank, institution, or society, except such as shall be applied to surplus; fifthly, shall not possess, in any form, a surplus fund exceeding 10 per cent of its aggregate deposits; nor to such savings banks, savings institutions, or societies composed of members who do not participate in the profits thereof and which pay interest or dividends only to their depositors; nor to that part of the business of any savings bank, institution, or other similar association having a capital stock, that is conducted on the mutual plan solely for the benefit of its depositors on such plan, and which shall keep its accounts of its business conducted on such mutual plan separate and apart from its other accounts.

Nor to any insurance company or association which conducts all its business solely upon the mutual plan, and only for the benefit of its policy holders or members, and having no capital stock and no stock or shareholders, and holding all its property in trust and in reserve for its policy holders or members; nor to that part of the business of any insurance company having a capital stock and stock and shareholders, which is conducted on the mutual plan, separate from its stock plan of insurance, and solely for the benefit of the policy holders and members insured on said mutual plan, and holding all the property belonging to and derived from said mutual part of its business in trust and reserve for the benefit of its policy holders and members insured on said mutual plan.

That all State, county, municipal, and town taxes paid by corporations, companies, or associations, shall be included in the operating and business expenses of such corporations, companies, or associations.

SEC. 83. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all salaries of officers, or payments for services to persons in the civil, military, naval, or other employment or service of the United States, including Senators and Representatives and Delegates in Congress, when exceeding the rate of $4,000 per annum, a tax of 2 per cent on the excess above the said $4,000; and it shall be the duty of all paymasters and all disbursing officers under the Government of the United States, or persons in the employ thereof, when making any payment to any officers or persons as aforesaid, whose compensation is determined by a fixed salary, or upon settling or adjusting the accounts of such officers or persons, to deduct and withhold the aforesaid tax of 2 per cent; and the pay roll, receipts, or account of officers or persons paying such tax as aforesaid shall be made to exhibit the fact of such payment. And it shall be the duty of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, when auditing the accounts of any paymaster or disbursing officer, or any officer withholding his salary from moneys received by him, or when settling or adjusting the accounts of any such officer, to require evidence that the taxes mentioned in this section have been deducted and paid over to the Treasurer of the United States, or other officer authorized to receive the same. Every corporation which pays to any employee a salary or compensation exceeding $4,000 per annum shall report the same to the collector or deputy collector of his district and said employee shall pay thereon, subject to the exemptions herein provided for, the tax of 2 per cent on the excess of his salary over $4,000: Provided, That salaries due to State, county, or municipal officers shall be exempt from the income tax herein levied.

SEC. 84. That sections 3167, 3172, 3173, and 3176 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended are hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3167. That it shall be unlawful for any collector, deputy collector, agent, clerk, or other officer or employee of the United States to divulge or to make known, in any manner whatever not provided by law, to any person the operations, style of work, or apparatus of any manufacturer or producer visited by him in the discharge of his official duties, or the amount or source of income, profits, losses, expenditures, or any particular thereof, set forth or disclosed in any income return by any person or corporation, or to permit any income return or copy thereof or any book containing any abstract or particulars thereof, to be seen or examined by any person except as provided by law; and it shall be unlawful for any person to print or publish, in any manner whatever not provided by law, any income return or any part thereof, or the amount or source of income, profits, losses, or expenditures appearing in any income return; and any offense against the foregoing provision shall be a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court; and if the offender be an officer or employee of the United States, he shall be dismissed from office and be incapable thereafter of holding any office under the Government.

"SEC. 3172. That every collector shall, from time to time, cause his deputies to proceed through every part of his district and inquire after and concerning all persons therein who are liable to pay any internal revenue tax, and all persons owning or having the care and management of any objects liable to pay any tax, and to make a list of such persons and enumerate said objects.

"SEC. 3173. That it shall be the duty of any person, partnership, firm, association, or corporation, made liable to any duty, special tax, or other tax imposed by law, when not otherwise provided for, in case of a special tax, on or before the 31st day of July in each year, in case of income tax on or before the first Monday of March in each year, and in other cases before the day on which the taxes accrue, to make a list or return, verified by oath or affirmation, to the collector or a deputy collector of the district where located, of the articles or objects, including the amount of annual income, charged with a duty or tax, the quantity of goods, wares, and merchandise made or sold, and charged with a tax, the several rates and aggregate amount, according to the forms and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for which such person, partnership, firm, association, or corporation is liable: Provided, That if any person liable to pay any duty or tax, or owning, possessing, or having the care or management of property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles or objects liable to pay any duty, tax, or license, shall fail to make and exhibit a list or return required by law, but shall consent to disclose the particulars of any and all the property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles and objects liable to pay any duty or tax, or any business or occupation liable to pay any tax as aforesaid, then, and in that case, it shall be the duty of the collector or deputy collector to make such list or return, which, being distinctly read, consented to, and signed and verified by oath or affirmation by the person so owning, possessing, or having the care and management as aforesaid, may be received as the list of such person: Provided further, That in case no annual list or return has been rendered by such person to the collector or deputy collector as required by law, and the person shall be absent from his or her residence or place of business at the time the collector or a deputy collector shall call for the annual list or return, it shall be the duty of such collector or deputy collector to leave at such place of residence or business, with some one of suitable age and discretion, if such be present, otherwise to deposit in the nearest post-office a note or memorandum addressed to such person, requiring him or her to render to such collector or deputy collector the list or return required by law, within ten days from the date of such note or memorandum, verified by oath or affirmation. And if any person on being notified or required as aforesaid shall refuse or neglect to render such list or return within the time required as aforesaid or whenever any person who is required to deliver a monthly or other return of objects subject to tax fails to do so at the time required, or delivers any return which, in the opinion of the collector, is false or fraudulent, or contains any undervaluation or understatement, it shall be lawful for the collector to summon such person, or any other person having possession, custody, or care of books or account containing entries relating to the business of such person, or any other person he may deem proper, to appear before him and produce such books, at a time and place named in the summons, and to give testimony or answer interrogatories, under oath, respecting any objects liable to tax or the returns thereof. The collector may summon any person residing or found within the State in which his district lies; and when the person intended to be summoned does not reside and can not be found within such State, he may enter any collection district where such person may be found, and there make the examination herein authorized. And to this end he may there exercise all the authority which he might lawfully exercise in the district for which he was commissioned.

"SEC. 3176. When any person, corporation, company, or association refuses or neglects to render any return or list required by law, or renders a false or fraudulent return or list, the collector or any deputy collector shall make, according to the best information which he can obtain, including that derived from the evidence elicited by the examination of the collector, and on his own view and information, such list or return, according to the form prescribed, of the income, property, and objects liable to tax owned or possessed or under the care or management of such person, or corporation, company, or association, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall assess all taxes not paid by stamps, including the amount, if any, due for special tax, income or other tax, and in case of any return of a false or fraudulent list or valuation intentionally he shall add 100 per cent to such tax; and in case of a refusal or neglect, except in cases of sickness or absence, to make a list or return, or to verify the same as aforesaid, he shall add 50 per cent to such tax. In case of neglect occasioned by sickness or absence as aforesaid the collector may allow such further time for making and delivering such list or return as he may deem necessary, not exceeding thirty days. The amount so added to the tax shall be collected at the same time and in the same manner as the tax unless the neglect or falsity is discovered after the tax has been paid, in which case the amount so added shall be collected in the same manner as the tax; and the list or return so made and subscribed by such collector or deputy collector shall be held prima facie good and sufficient for all legal purposes."

SEC. 35. That every corporation, company, or association doing business for profit shall make and render to the collector of its collection district, on or before the first Monday of March in every year, beginning with the year 1895, a full return, verified by oath or affirmation, in such form as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe, of all the following matters for the whole calendar year last preceding the date of such return:

First. The gross profits of such corporation, company, or association, from all kinds of business of every name and nature.

Second. The expenses of such corporation, company, or association, exclusive of interest, annuities, and dividends.

Third. The net profits of such corporation, company, or association, without allowance for interest, annuities, or dividends.

Fourth. The amount paid on account of interest, annuities, and dividends, stated separately.

Fifth. The amount paid in salaries of $4,000 or less to each person employed.

Sixth. The amount paid in salaries of more than $4,000 to each person employed, and the name and address of each of such persons and the amount paid to each.

SEC. 34. That it shall be the duty of every corporation, company, or association doing business for profit to keep full, regular, and accurate books of account, upon which all its transactions shall be entered from day to day, in regular order, and whenever a collector or deputy collector of the district in which any corporation, company, or association is assessable shall believe that a true and correct return of the income of such corporation, company, or association has not been made, he shall make an affidavit of such belief and of the grounds on which it is founded, and file the same with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and if said Commissioner shall, on examination thereof, and after full hearing, upon notice given to all parties, conclude there is good ground for such belief he shall issue a request in writing to such corporation, company, or association to permit an inspection of the books of such corporation, company, or association to be made; and if such corporation, company, or association shall refuse to comply with such request, then the collector or deputy collector of the district shall make from such information as he can obtain an estimate of the amount of such income and then add 50 per cent thereto, which said assessment so made shall then be the lawful assessment of such income.

SEC. 37. That it shall be the duty of every collector of internal revenue to whom any payment of any taxes other than the tax represented by an adhesive stamp or other engraved stamp is made under the provisions of this act to give to the person making such payment a full written or printed receipt, expressing the amount paid and the particular account for which such payment was made; and whenever such payment is made such collector shall, if required, give a separate receipt for each tax paid by any debtor, on account of payments made to or to be made by him to separate creditors in such form that such debtor can conveniently produce the same separately to his several creditors in satisfaction of their respective demands to the amounts specified in such receipts; and such receipts shall be sufficient evidence in favor of such debtor, to justify him in withholding the amount therein expressed from his next payment to his creditor; but such creditor may, upon giving to his debtor a full written receipt, acknowledging the payment to him of whatever sum may be actually paid, and accepting the amount of tax paid as aforesaid (specifying the same) as a further satisfaction of the debt to that amount, require the surrender to him of such collector's receipt.

[An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States, approved July 24, 1897.]

SEC. 34. That sections 1 to 24, both inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," which became a law on the 28th day of August, 1894, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, said repeal to take effect on and after the passage of this act, but the repeal of existing laws or modifications thereof embraced in this act shall not affect any act done, or any right accruing or accrued, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil cause before the said repeal or modifications; but all rights and liabilities under said laws shall continue and may be enforced in the same manner as if said repeal or modifications had not been made. Any offenses committed and all penalties or forfeitures or liabilities incurred prior to the passage of this act under any statute embraced in or changed, modified, or repealed by this act may be prosecuted or punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed. All acts of limitation, whether applicable to civil causes and proceedings or to the prosecution of offenses or for the recovery of penalties or forfeitures embraced in or modified, changed, or repealed by this act shall not be affected thereby; and all suits, proceedings, or prosecutions, whether civil or criminal, for causes arising or acts done or committed prior to the passage of this act may be commenced and prosecuted within the same time and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal the provisions of section 3068 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act approved February 23, 1897, in respect to the abandonment of merchandise to underwriters or the salvors of property, and the ascertainment of duties thereon: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or in any manner affect the sections numbered 73, 74, 75, 76, and 77 of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," which became a law on the 28th day of August, 1894.

[From syllabus, Pollock vs. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company.]

3. The tax imposed by sections 27-37, inclusive, of the act of 1894, so far as it falls on the income of real estate and of personal property, being a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution, and therefore unconstitutional and void, because not apportioned according to representation, all those sections, constituting one entire scheme of taxation, are necessarily invalid.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not care, especially at this time, to discuss the general effect of the proposed inheritance tax, although I should like later to say something about taking from the States without sufficient necessity an important source of revenue. But there are one or two provisions in the amendment upon which I should like some explanation. One is the proviso on page 68. That proviso is as follows:

That all legacies or property passing by will, or by the laws of any State or Territory, to husband or wife of the person died possessed, as aforesaid, shall be exempt from tax or duty.

That is where the property passes directly; but if money is left in trust for a wife, I can not see how it could fail to be taxed. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado what the intention of the committee is in regard to that matter?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have no question at all that if it passes in trust and not directly, it will be subject to the imposition of the tax as levied by the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Then I can not see how it is just or equitable that property left to a wife directly should be free from taxation and property left in trust for the benefit of the wife, which is exactly the same purpose, should be taxed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It might be left upon condition or otherwise. If a testator desires to avoid the payment of the tax due the Government upon a legacy of personal property, he may trust his wife as the proper person to be the recipient under his will; but if he sees fit to keep it from her by putting it in trust, he contemplates that that legacy shall pay its fair share of duty for the maintenance of the Government.

Mr. LODGE. I can not see why the distinction should be made. Either no distinction should be made or else it should be an exemption for all that class.

Mr. LINDSAY. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that possibly it was the idea of the committee that the trustee would appropriate it to his own uses, and therefore it might be properly taxed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, not the slightest.

Mr. LINDSAY. I can not see any other reason for the distinction.

Mr. LODGE. That is one explanation undoubtedly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Not the slightest.

Mr. LODGE. I can not see the justice of exempting one widow because the property is left to her directly and taxing another widow because, as is very commonly the case, the husband has put it in trust for her benefit. We know that most of the property held in trust is held for the benefit of widows and minor children, and on that safe method of a man's providing for his wife a tax is put, whereas if he leaves it outright to her directly she is untaxed.

Either this proviso, it seems to me, ought to go out altogether, or else it ought to apply to all cases. I do not see any reason for a distinction between the property left in trust to a widow and the property left outright. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to the proviso.

There is another point that I desired to ask about. I may be wrong in my interpretation of the bill, but what appears to me to be the case is that if a man inherits $100,000 from an estate of $200,000 he pays one tax. If he inherits $100,000, exactly the same amount, from an estate of $1,000,000, he pays a much heavier tax. The man who inherits $100,000 from the estate of $1,000,000 may be a poor man, and the man who inherits $100,000 from the estate of $200,000 may be a rich man, and yet the man inheriting the $100,000 from the estate of $1,000,000 pays two and a half times as much; that is, the tax appears to be levied upon the original estate, without any reference to the beneficiaries. I do not see why $100,000 in a legacy should pay more coming from an estate of one size than coming from an estate of another size.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he believes, in view of some of the enormous accumulations of fortunes in this country, out of which the personal property pays practically nothing in taxation during the life of the owner, it is inequitable that a personal estate of $5,000,000 should pay a greater sum proportionately to the Government than an estate of $20,000?

Mr. LODGE. That opens up the whole question of a graduated tax. I believe, as a matter of sound taxation, the object is to tax the dollar and not the man. I believe the dollar should be taxed, whether it is $1 in twenty thousand or $1 in five million.

Now, I favor an inheritance tax as a principle of taxation. We have an inheritance tax on collateral inheritances in my own State, from which last year we collected over $500,000. It is only applied to collateral inheritances, but it is an important branch of revenue in my State. I think it was a wisely imposed tax, that it is a wise law, and very possibly it might be carried further. I think also that it is a tax which ought to be left to the State and not taken by the United States. But I fail to see the justice of taxing a man who gets perhaps $5,000 as a small bequest from an estate of a million dollars. Perhaps it is all that he has. When that is left him by a person possessing a million-dollar estate, why should he pay two and a half times as much tax as a man who gets precisely the same amount from a smaller estate?

I agree it seems on the surface proper that a large estate should pay more than a small estate, and if the tax was graded in that way it might be open to less objection. But this is graded so as to tax the legacies on a different scale. The object is, of course, to reach the property; and it seems to me that where the legacy is the same a man should not be forced to pay more on the same amount because he happens to receive his legacy from a larger estate.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I talked with a number of members of the committee—those who were here—and at the suggestion of several Senators, I think I may feel authorized, in the absence of objection from those who have not been consulted, to say that on page 67, line 6, there will be no objection to erasing the word "five" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ten." That meets some objections which have been made.

Mr. SPOONER. How about page 68, where the limitation of $5,000 occurs?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I was coming to that. Also on line 30, page 68, erase the word "five" and insert the word "ten." [To Mr. ALDRICH.] You will have no objection to that change?

Mr. ALDRICH. No.

Mr. BACON. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Colorado merely as a matter of information. I presume there is a reason for it. Why is it that there is an exemption from this tax in favor of a legacy or an inheritance by a wife or a husband and no exemption in the case of orphan children?

Mr. WOLCOTT. They would not be orphaned, of course, until the parent died.

Mr. BACON. That would be the time when the matter would come up.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Naturally. The suggestion of the bill was that where property was left to the wife or the husband, the surviving member of the marital partnership, it was proper to suspend the collection of the tax until death, but where property went to children and was above $10,000 (and it is the personal property only above $10,000, and does not touch real estate), it was not an onerous tax to say that this small percentage should be taken from the personal property, except where it goes by devise to the wife.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I was not speaking as to the amount of the tax or as to whether it would be burdensome or not, but I was unable to see the reason by which the committee was actuated in saying that if a man died and left simply a widow she should pay no tax.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It comes later to the Government. It comes to the Government when she dies.

Mr. BACON. That might be equally true if a man died and left an orphan child.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The purpose, of course, was to collect revenue, and we made the wife the only exception, following exactly, I will say to the Senator, the provision of the old law which was for many years in force in this country and which worked admirably and produced an excellent revenue.

Mr. BACON. I suppose, then, the reason is that it is because the old law said so.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Not at all, but because common sense dictated it. You have got to stop somewhere. It seems to me an absurd question to ask why did not the committee except the children. I suppose if I answered that, then the Senator would ask, "Why did you not except the father and mother?"

Mr. BACON. No, sir.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And if I had answered that, then he would have said, "Why did you not except the poor uncles and poor aunts? And then, why did you not except the grandchildren, and why leave out the aged great uncles and cousins?" It is the object of the bill to raise revenue. We left out the widow, because in the discretion of the committee it seemed to be a wise exception and experience proved that it worked very well. In many other countries in the world the same law has been enforced, only with increased percentages, and it has worked admirably. That was the reason why. I can not tell what passed in the minds of the other members of the committee, but we did not make any other exceptions, because it did not seem wise to make them. I do not know that I could answer the Senator further. I would be very glad to do so if the Senator would suggest any further point.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the Senator for his elaboration, but still he does not answer my question.

Mr. WOLCOTT. What does the Senator want to know?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me until he can hear what I have to say, of course I will endeavor to state it. The point I make is this: I asked the question with a view to get some enlightenment, if possible, and the Senator sets it aside in a cavalier manner, which does not give the information.

I will state, in the way of an illustration, the suggestion made by me. A man dies who has no children, leaving a widow. This law proposes to exempt the inheritance by that widow from any taxation whatsoever. The other case is where a man having no wife dies, leaving an orphan child. Now, why should the wife be a greater object of solicitude on the part of the law than the minor child? That is what I desire to have explained if I can get the calm consideration of the Senator from Colorado to an endeavor to explain it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the Senator will read once more the bill, he will find that if the man leaves a wife and leaves children, so much as comes to the wife is excepted.

Mr. BACON. I understand that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The orphan child does not necessarily come in, for a man may die and leave some property to his wife and some to his child half orphaned.

Mr. BACON. I was putting a case where, on the one hand, there was simply a widow who was left without a child, and on the other hand where the father left an orphan child, without any widow.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I suppose, in the contemplation of the law, as the child grew up he could hustle, or if a girl, she would get married and would have somebody to look after her.

The committee thought this a very proper tax to be levied. We did not poll the committee as to views, but all seemed to vote with great unanimity upon the question. The doubt suggested by the Senator from Georgia did not seem to rise in their breasts during the consideration of the bill. I do not know that I could answer the Senator further.

Mr. LODGE. In this discussion the solicitude of the committee for the unfortunate husband seems to have been overlooked. They exempt the husband, as I make it out—that is, they put a tax on property going to a minor child, which is perhaps an orphaned child, but they leave the husband untaxed. The husband and wife, who receive a direct interest, are untaxed; but if a wife receives her property through the hands of trustees, she is taxed. I do not believe in exemptions of that kind. I see no reason in the world for exempting the husband. I move, therefore, to strike out the proviso beginning in line 14, on page 68.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, first, on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WOLCOTT. To insert "ten" instead of "five."

Mr. LODGE. I thought that had been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 20, page 66, strike out "five" before "thousand" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

That any person or persons having in charge or trust, as administrators, executors, or trustees, any legacies or distributive shares arising from personal property, where the whole amount of such personal property as aforesaid shall exceed the sum of $10,000 in actual value, passing, after the passage of this act, from any person possessed of such property, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. And on page 67, line 6, the same amendment is to be made.

The SECRETARY. On page 67, line 6, strike out "five" and insert "ten" before "thousand;" so as to read:

Where the whole amount of said personal property shall exceed in value ten thousand and shall not exceed in value the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars the tax shall be.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to inquire whether the limitation on the amount is a limitation as to the whole estate or as to the individual legacy.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is only the personal estate, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. The provision is:

Where the whole amount of said personal property shall exceed in value $10,000, and shall not exceed in value the sum of $25,000, the tax shall be.

Does that mean the whole estate, or only the individual legacy?

Mr. WOLCOTT. The whole estate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Suppose a man has $100,000. He can not give ten legacies of $10,000 each without paying the tax?

Mr. WOLCOTT. It applies to the whole estate.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the whole estate which is bequeathed by the testator should amount to $10,000, is every legacy, however large or small, taxable?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Certainly. The amount of the tax on it is determined by the totality of the personal property left. If it be $10,000, then it is taxable, however small or large the legacy may be.

Mr. SPOONER. It might be a million dollars.

Mr. WOLCOTT. A million dollars of real estate would not be taxed at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood that; but I was not certain whether the words "such personal property" meant the totality of the personal property in the hands of the testator or donor, or whether it meant where the property passing to each individual amounted to $10,000. I understand now that it applies to a case where the whole estate exceeds $10,000, and if the amendment be adopted there will be no tax upon anything less than that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is right.

Mr. CHANDLER. And where it does exceed that amount, every legacy, large or small, is to pay the tax which is provided.

Mr. SPOONER. Right here arises the question which was asked by the Senator from Georgia as to an executor having to sell real estate to pay a legacy. Is that included in this provision?

Mr. WOLCOTT. The courts will pass upon that question. If the property is real estate, the tax does not apply; but it does apply when the property is sold for the purpose of paying the legacies. It reaches only to the personality.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Colorado will pardon me; as there is no expressed stipulation to that effect in this proposed statute, the question as to whether to regard it as personality is a question to be determined by law.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think it is very carefully expressed.

Mr. BACON. There are certain rules of law which determine that money in the hands of an executor or an administrator or trustee in certain cases, partakes of the nature of realty, and in other cases where it is considered realty. Therefore, while I do not propose to offer it now, I have prepared an amendment, with the assistance, I will say, of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], by which I had hoped to cure the danger which lurked in that fact.

I will state, for illustration, one rule of law is that if a testator give a legacy of money and the executor has to sell the real estate for the purpose of raising the money to pay that legacy, under the rule of law that money is treated as personality. That being a rule of law, and there being no expressed provision in this statute saying that it shall be exempt, it is necessary that there should be some language to cure that difficulty.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator offer his amendment now, so that we may look at it?

Mr. BACON. I have reduced it to writing.

Mr. TURPIE. The amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Georgia for a most beneficent purpose raises a most serious question as to certain cases which the power of taxation was intended to meet. We do not intend to tax land, because we can not tax it except in a certain way; but, in my judgment, we can not tax the proceeds of land.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If we can have the amendment read, I should like to hear it. I am under the impression that the proposed law is perfectly clear, but I should like to hear the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I will read the amendment myself.

Mr. ALDRICH. What has become of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts has not yet been acted upon.

Mr. LODGE. My amendment was pending to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. FAULKNER. That amendment was not acted upon, but the other amendment was.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be happy to withdraw my amendment and allow the Senator from Georgia to offer his amendment now.

Mr. FAULKNER. That does not affect the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts in the least. If the Chair will submit the question on the amendment on page 67, I think there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the amendment of the committee in line 6 on page 67? The Chair hears none, and the amendment to the amendment is agreed to, striking out "five" and inserting "ten," so as to make the amount $10,000.

Mr. LODGE. That amendment being disposed of, I move to strike out the proviso on page 68.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee on page 68, line 14, after the word "interest," by striking out the following proviso:

Provided, That all legacies or property passing by will, or by the laws of any State or Territory, to husband or wife of the person died possessed, as aforesaid, shall be exempt from tax or duty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it seems to me that there are perfectly intelligible lines which can be drawn in regard to the exemption of inheritances. You may tax collaterals and leave out direct descendants, as is done by the law of Massachusetts—that is an intelligent and intelligible distinction—or you may include all persons inheriting property, and make it, like the death duties in England, fall on all property, no matter to whom it goes.

It seems to me that to put a tax on the property inherited by children and to exempt the property inherited by a husband has no good reason. Neither can I see any reason for the distinction in regard to the wife who has property left to her in trust and a wife who has property left to her outright. I have in mind at this moment two great estates, one of which was said to be over $20,000,000, which went entirely to the widow. Every dollar of it would have been exempt under this provision. Another estate, almost as large, was divided between the widow and the son, and all that went to the widow, in that case several million dollars, would have been exempt.

I see no possible reason for exempting the husband if we are going to tax the wife who has property left to her in the hands of trustees. I think we want to tax them all. Let us be fair. If we are going to impose any inheritance tax—and I doubt very much our constitutional right to do it—but if we are going to impose one, let us impose one that shall fall fairly upon all property passing by will or under the laws of any State or Territory. That will make it fair for everybody. There will be no distinctions then between one widow and another widow, or between the husband and wife and children. If it is sound in principle to have a graduated inheritance tax, it ought to fall on the estates that go to wives and husbands just as much as on any other estates. Therefore, Mr. President, in order to make it fair and equitable, I move to strike out that proviso.

Mr. ALDRICH. The laws of all the various States and, so far as I know, the laws of all civilized countries regulating successions recognize that there is a great difference between the rights of the husband and wife in property left by one to the other member of the conjugal firm and those existing between the children and the parents in such cases. The money left either by a husband or a wife is, in a certain sense, a joint fund, and in many cases represents the joint earnings of both husband and wife. Certainly those people stand in very different relation to the property from what even the children would. I think the exemption which was in the acts of 1864 and 1867 exists in all the laws regulating successions in all the countries of the world.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Everywhere.

Mr. ALDRICH. And it is very proper that it should be so.

Mr. LODGE. It does not exist in England, I am very certain.

Mr. ALDRICH. There has been no question on the part of anyone, so far as I remember, but that it was a good one. Of course it is a question of judgment to be submitted to the Senate. I think there is a very good reason why the exemption should exist.

Mr. SPOONER. At the same time there are no fathers or mothers in the world with a right heart who do not work from the beginning to the end and sacrifice themselves so as to leave money to their children.

Mr. ALDRICH. Unquestionably; and this general fund in turn becomes the property of the children.

Mr. SPOONER. It sometimes happens when the wife marries again and has a new family that the children by the first marriage may not get any of the property.

Mr. ALDRICH. When the wife marries again the property which comes from the first husband goes to her children by that husband in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Or some children get it, anyway.

Mr. MASON. I have a few words to suggest. I think I understand the reason which actuated the committee in leaving an exception as to the inheritance from the husband to the wife or the wife to the husband. At common law they are one. The statutes of the different States for the purpose of protecting the individual estate of the wife or the husband have from time to time varied the common law; but it is upon the theory—and I think the committee has acted wisely—upon the sound theory that the husband and wife are one, and where the husband derives from the wife's estate or the wife from the husband's it is not, strictly speaking, an inheritance, and ought not to be taxed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts were in the line of an improvement of a portion of the bill for which he intended to vote, I think a great many members of the Senate might be inclined to follow him, in view of the absolute necessity of raising funds for the prosecution of this war; but inasmuch as it is very apparent from his remarks that, should he succeed in striking out the provision as to husband and wife, his intention is to vote against the whole amendment when he has a chance, and inasmuch as the effect of it must be to make the bill more onerous, and for that reason perhaps a little more objectionable, I suggest the amendment of the committee should stand, and I think we are perhaps ready to vote upon it now.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the details of this inheritance tax, nor shall I discuss the measure at any length at this time; but there is a matter to which attention ought to be called, and that is the inequities, if I may so express it, of this measure, which proposes to tax the estate of a dead man and permits the estate of a live man to escape. The whole scheme is wrong in its foundation and its policy.

Mr. MASON. How can a dead man have an estate which he can enjoy and which can be taxed? I hope the Senator will excuse my interrupting him.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Illinois is getting very technical and quite facetious.

Mr. MASON. Not at all.

Mr. ALLEN. Whenever a man dies and leaves his estate, and is no longer able to struggle for his family, then his estate is to be singled out and taxed for national purposes, when it is not taxed during his lifetime.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to make a suggestion to him, which I think he will cordially agree with?

Mr. ALLEN. I will.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is, that the experience of the last twenty-five years of this country has demonstrated without a doubt that live men with large properties can always evade the taxgatherer so far as their personal estate is concerned. The Senator knows, and I know, of men worth a million dollars of personal property who pay practically no taxes whatever. In the great State of New York a bill to tax inheritances was vetoed by its governor because it would drive people out of that State into New Jersey and other States for a legal residence. It is because the law can not reach such persons when they are alive that we propose to enact into law now a general provision which will reach every State in the Union, and which will say that these great estates shall not be passed down without the Government getting its fair share by the imposition of a tax on these great properties which it has protected through all these years. That is why it was done. If we could reach the living man we would do so, but we can not. The tax collectors have not been able to do that for years, and the Senator must know that.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the remark of the Senator from Colorado confirms me still more strongly that I was right when I started. [Laughter.] In other words, the Senator says you can not levy and collect a tax of a man while he is alive. I do not believe that.

Mr. CULLOM. Nor do I.

Mr. ALLEN. I believe we can enact a tax law, and if we have honest and efficient officers we can collect the tax of the man while he lives. If we can not, our Government is a failure, so far as its taxing power is concerned.

The position of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] is simply this: All during the life of the individual he can escape taxation, but the taxgatherer must stand at his grave with his widow and children, and there for the first time he can collect the tax.

I do not decry the collection of a reasonable inheritance tax. I think it is right. But is it right, Mr. President, to stand with the widow and the children at the grave side of a dead father to collect a tax, while you permit the millions and millions of estates of live men to escape, as the Senator from Colorado says they do escape? Why, Mr. President, it is within the power of Congress to devise a scheme of taxation which will be just to all and make the burdens of taxation rest equally on all.

The truth is, we sometimes connive at the evasion of tax laws. We connived at the evasion of the tax law of 1894 until it was practically repealed or made inoperative by a failure to carry out its provisions, and was finally nullified by the Supreme Court, overruling five of its own decisions to the contrary extending over a hundred years.

Mr. President, it is impossible for a man to own a great estate, amounting to a million dollars or more, or amounting to even $20,000, and escape taxation, if the tax officers are alert and undertake to enforce the law. Why not tax the estate when the husband is alive, when he is competent to earn a living for his family and to accumulate? Why wait until his widow is in weeds and his children in tears before you undertake to collect anything from his estate?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not want to be misunderstood in regard to the position I have taken upon this subject. I am not opposed to an inheritance tax. On the contrary, I favor an inheritance tax. We have had, as I have already said, in my State for some years an inheritance tax extending only to collateral inheritances, which, I think, is a very proper inheritance tax. If the United States are going to lay an inheritance tax, we ought to lay it fairly; and I think to make these exemptions and exceptions is not fair; and to put the heaviest taxes that you impose on a bequest to charity seems to me unwise legislation.

My objection to the amendment proceeds solely on the very narrow ground, perhaps, that it is taking from the States one of their necessary sources of revenue. The United States, under the Constitution, has taken to itself all the duties to be imposed on imports, and it has been our consistent policy to leave to the State all the other forms of taxation except excises. The field of taxation which the States have is narrow at best. When we take this inheritance tax from them by making it so burdensome that they will be unable to maintain it, and when we take from them their tax on banks and corporations, which supplies a very large part of the revenue of some States—it does of the State of Massachusetts, where they derive over $5,000,000 from banks and corporations that are taxed in that State, the tax being divided among the towns according to the stockholders who live in the different towns and cities of the Commonwealth and used directly for the maintenance of local expenses—I say when you take all these sources of revenue from the States, you are going to embarrass many of them and accumulate a very heavy burden of local and municipal taxation in a very few channels.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The State of Massachusetts ought to pay from $250,000 to $500,000 a year, perhaps, to the Government under this tax. The Senator has told us how intensely loyal Massachusetts is. If this condition is to interfere with the favorite method of State taxation in that State, how would the State of Massachusetts like to make up this amount to the Government, will the Senator tell us?

Mr. LODGE. The State of Massachusetts, Mr. President, will pay its full share of taxes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Upon what, if you take this out?

Mr. LODGE. There is no occasion to sneer at Massachusetts, because I was mentioning some of the objections to this tax. We have never been slow in paying our share of taxation that I am aware of, and we shall not be now; but we are not the only community that imposes an inheritance tax and imposes bank and corporation taxes. I think it is wise to raise the money we need for the Government as equitably as possible, and to impose the most burdensome taxes last.

If we need to raise the money from bank and corporation taxes, and if we need to raise it from inheritance taxes and death duties, all right. I shall vote to do so as cheerfully as anybody. I do not think, however, that that time has yet come; but I am perfectly willing to bow to the wisdom of the committee and of the Senate in regard to the inheritance tax, if they think it is absolutely necessary in order to raise funds for the Government; but if we are to impose inheritance taxes, I utterly fail to see why they should not fall on all alike. I see no reason for exempting from taxation some of the great estates, such as have passed within our own knowledge to the wife or to the husband. I think they ought to be taxed the same as any other estates.

I do not believe that it is necessary to go so far as we have gone in some of these amendments, but if they are adopted by the Senate, I shall vote for the bill, of course, and for those amendments. I am not objecting to the raising of revenue, but I do think that whatever taxes we impose, be they heavy or be they light, we should not exempt or favor anybody.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think that estates inherited by children should pay the same rate as those inherited by outside persons?

Mr. LODGE. I think it is perfectly proper to draw the distinction between collaterals and immediate descendants. I think that is a perfectly legitimate distinction; but I do not think there is any good reason for exempting a husband who inherits the estate of a rich wife, or a widow who inherits all the estate of a rich husband, nor do I see any possible reason why it would be proper to exempt the estate left to a widow directly. It seems to me that an estate left in trust for the benefit of a widow is entitled to an equal exception, and therefore that it is better to let it fall on all alike.

I have not proposed the amendment with the idea of making the inheritance tax more odious. I am aware that it is going to be adopted. I have no serious objection to its adoption, but I think it is a very serious objection to draw a distinction between one class of persons and another; and if the object is to tax all property at the period of transfer by death, I think the taxation should fall on all property alike, and that there should be no exemption, unless you propose to draw the broad line which is drawn in some States between collateral and direct descendants.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, it seems to me this amendment may bring on a contest between the General Government and the States in the matter of taxation, and it seems to me that we can raise enough money to pay the expenses of this war without resorting to this doubtful tax. In my judgment an inheritance tax belongs exclusively to the States and not to the United States, and that the States ought to have the sole right to impose this mode of taxation.

An inheritance tax or the right to inherit, according to the decisions of the courts of the States that have passed upon the question and the Supreme Court of the United States, is a privilege and not a natural right, and that being a privilege, it is taxable. Suppose a State should deny this privilege of inheritance, and should say that nobody shall make wills, no property shall descend after death to heirs, but all property shall escheat to the State. How would the General Government in such an event be able to collect the tax provided for in this bill or amendment? If a State should take from its citizens by law the privilege to dispose of property by will, then the General Government would be powerless.

In a recent case that came up from the State of Illinois, argued in February and the decision rendered in March, the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the supreme court of Illinois in declaring that an inheritance tax was a privilege, and being a privilege, it was taxable. If you can tax a privilege, you can tax it to death and thereby end the privilege.

It seems to me that this provision may produce an unnecessary conflict between the General Government and the States. I do not know how much revenue is to be raised by this amendment—not more than two or three millions. I do not agree with the Senator from Colorado that everybody evades the payment of personal taxes, and therefore an inheritance tax is justifiable and should be resorted to by the General Government.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I meant to except the Senator from West Virginia. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. I am glad you did. I agree somewhat with what the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] has said. I think his views on this case are very liberal and advanced. I am glad he is in favor of giving estates directly to heirs without taxing them. I expected to hear him say that he was in favor of dividing the estates up during the lives of the owners.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Nebraska did take that position.

Mr. ELKINS. I thought he would, though I did not hear him do so.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Nebraska said the committee should not have waited until men died to tax their estates, but that the estates of millionaires and men of wealth ought to be pursued while they are alive, that a fair share of them ought to be taken while they are alive, instead of waiting until the widow is in weeds and the children in tears.

Mr. ELKINS. I thought the Senator from Nebraska meant to take all property and distribute it and divide it up, and not allow the States to administer on it, but divide it among the people. I thought that was the position of the Senator from Nebraska.

I agree with the Senator that laws could be framed by which taxes which are imposed can be collected, and I think many of the States have laws amply sufficient to enforce and compel the collection of all taxes. As a general rule, I believe that all taxes are paid as levied, and the evasions are not as flagrant as some believe.

Mr. President, I believe in raising money enough by taxation to carry on this war, and I believe further in every generation paying its war debts. If war is a luxury, the generation should pay for it which brings it on. Now we are face to face with the problem of paying the expenses of the war, and we ought to pay the debt and not leave it to future generations to pay. Let us tax beer, tax whisky, tax everything that is taxable, and tax salaries, if you please.

Mr. ALLEN. Why not tax incomes?

Mr. ELKINS. I am willing to meet this question when it comes up; but I think to go off on this tangent and create a conflict between the General Government and the States is dangerous. I stand here for State rights, and I do not know what has become of my friends on the other side of the Chamber who have been such staunch advocates of that doctrine.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is the Senator aware that this tax was on the statute books for years and was very admirable in collecting revenue during war times?

Mr. ELKINS. We had a great big war on hand then, no such an affair as this.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado where he finds the taxes to which he refers? Were they imposed in 1862? I have been unable to find any such provision.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It was in 1864, and the provision is reproduced word for word here, except that we have made the legacy tax higher for the larger estates and lower upon smaller estates. Otherwise it is the same as the law of 1864.

Mr. ELKINS. I took the Senator's word for that.

Mr. LINDSAY. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado when the tax was repealed?

Mr. WOLCOTT. In 1870, I think. I have my memorandum downstairs. I did not expect that this question would come up to-day.

Mr. ELKINS. If this is to go on, I want to know what the States will have left on which to tax the people. If the General Government exercises this prerogative of taxing property on the one side and the State governments on the other, and the counties and the cities tax, too, what will be the end of taxation, where will it stop, and how can business survive under taxation by all constituted authority?

The Senator from Rhode Island said every government in the world does it. But all governments are not republics. All governments do not have States—governments within governments—as we do. In England there are no States to impose taxes. There is only one tax in England. She has no States. In Great Britain they have a succession tax, or an inheritance tax, and that is the end of it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes; but they are very much higher in every country in Europe than the sum of all the State taxes and our taxes put together, many times over.

Mr. ELKINS. A man with property will not be able to survive if this principle travels as fast as it has been traveling in the last few years in Congress. If you have State, city, county, and the General Government tax the same property over and over again, this is the beginning of the end. You might as well say—and that is what it means in the end—that a man shall not accumulate more than a certain sum during his life. It is simply a tax against the accumulation of wealth.

It favors spending as you go, on the theory the Government will take it away when you die. What will be the incentive to accumulation if you can tax inheritances? Individualism, so far as we know, is the best thing civilization has known. It builds up and creates wealth, and the creation of wealth is not to be despised. It is an evidence of high civilization, and where there is no great wealth there is no progressive civilization.

It does seem to me that we are leaving the ancient landmarks, breaking down ancient traditions, making war on the States in order to raise a small sum amounting to two or three million dollars, when we could and should get the revenue otherwise. I am willing to be taxed. Yes; pay high taxes to carry on this war.

Again, I want to say a word for the States. If the General Government is going to take everything into its own hands, we might as well wipe out State lines and do as they do in England, have one supreme authority.

I suppose that would meet the approbation of the Senator from Rhode Island. Then we can have an income tax and a succession tax, but we would have no State tax. But it is not fair to get up here and argue that because Germany, Belgium, France, England, and Russia have an income and an inheritance tax the United States ought to have these taxes also. He forgets that there are no States there to tax property and that there is only one taxing power.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from West Virginia could not have paid much attention to my remarks.

Mr. ELKINS. I always give close attention to the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not make any observation upon this provision of the bill except as applying to the exemption of husband and wife.

Mr. ELKINS. I beg pardon, but I thought the Senator said they had such taxes all over the world.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not.

Mr. ELKINS. I suppose he made that statement as an argument why the United States should have such a tax.

Mr. ALDRICH. I said all countries exempted husband and wife from this provision.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator is compromising the question, and there is no question but what the Senator knows better. In this matter I stand for the States. Inheritance and succession taxes belong to the State and not the General Government. I do not oppose them or the principle in the States and as a matter of State jurisdiction. We have ample property to tax outside of inheritances, and we should have the courage to tax this property. The people are loyal and patriotic, and stand ready to make any sacrifice for the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the next amendment may be stated.

Mr. BACON. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the Senator can probably just as well prepare the amendment and offer it in the Senate. I ask that the next amendment may be read.

Mr. GORMAN. Perhaps the Senator from Georgia wants to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the next amendment be stated.

Mr. BACON. I send the amendment to the desk and ask the Senator to note it and to suggest the point where he thinks it best to put it in.

Mr. ALDRICH. The amendment can be offered in the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I will state that the sole purpose of the amendment is to make that reality which might under some rule of law be considered personality.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the amendment may be printed, and the committee will examine.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I think we ought to have order in the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Yes; I can not hear myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that it is impossible to transact business. Senators complain that they can not hear.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the next amendment may be stated.

Mr. BACON. I do not know what disposition was made of my amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the Senator desires to have the amendment printed, and the committee will examine it after it is printed, with a view to its adoption or consideration hereafter.

Mr. BACON. I have no desire to have it printed unless the Senator from Rhode Island desires that it shall be.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to have it printed. There will be a meeting of the committee to-morrow, and I should be glad to look into it.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] desires that it shall be read, and I join in the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following:

That all money received by any executor, administrator, or trustee as the proceeds of the sale of any real estate sold for the purpose of distribution, or for the payment of legacies, or for other purposes, shall, for the purposes of this act, be taken and deemed to be real estate, and not taxed hereunder.

Mr. ALDRICH. The committee will consider it. I ask that the next amendment of the committee may be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, after line 22, on page 72, to insert:

Sec. — That all administrative, special, or stamp provisions not heretofore specifically repealed are hereby made applicable to this act.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to insert after "provisions," in line 24, the words "of law;" so as to read, "provisions of law."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the next amendment may be stated, not, however, with a view of proceeding with its consideration to-night.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to inquire whether we have reached the point where amendments are in order?

Mr. ALDRICH. To what?

Mr. ALLEN. To the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. All the committee amendments have not been disposed of.

Mr. ALLEN. Will that rule hold good until the bond feature is disposed of?

Mr. ALDRICH. Of course. After the committee amendments are disposed of any amendment to any provision of the bill will be in order.

Mr. ALLEN. We will have to go back over the bill.

Mr. FRYE. We can go anywhere.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like, with the permission of the Senator from Rhode Island, to offer two proposed amendments and have them printed and referred to the committee in charge of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the amendments be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 41, after line 15, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require a stamp or the payment of a tax on any bundle or package of newspapers wholly or partially printed and intended for general circulation and reading.

It is proposed to insert in line 18, page 15, the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require retail druggists to stamp or pay a tax on any proprietary or other article owned and kept in any retail drug store at the time this act takes effect.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the amendments may be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope that will be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the next committee amendment may be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out from line 1, on page 73, to line 13, on page 74, as follows:

LOANS.

SEC. 27. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States the sum of $500,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and to prepare and issue therefor, at not less than par, coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, and in denominations of $25 or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after ten years from the date of their issue, and payable twenty years from such date, and bearing interest payable quarterly in coin, at the rate of 3 per cent per annum; and the bonds herein authorized shall be exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority: Provided, That the bonds authorized by this section shall be first offered as a popular loan under such regulations, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, as will give opportunity to the citizens of the United States to participate in the subscriptions to such loan; and a sum not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent of the amount of the bonds herein authorized is hereby appropriated to pay the expense of preparing, advertising, issuing, and disposing of the same.

SEC. 28. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow from time to time, at the market rate of interest, not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, such sum or sums as, in his judgment, may be necessary to meet public expenditures, and to issue therefor certificates of indebtedness in such form as he may prescribe and in denominations of $50 or some multiple of that sum; and each certificate so issued shall be payable, with the interest accrued thereon, at such time, not exceeding one year from the date of its issue, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the amount of such certificates outstanding shall at no time exceed $100,000,000; and the provisions of existing law respecting counterfeiting and other fraudulent practices are hereby extended to the bonds and certificates of indebtedness authorized by this act.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

COINAGE OF SILVER SEIGNIORAGE.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be coined, as fast and as soon as possible, into standard silver dollars, which shall be of like weight and fineness, and of like legal-tender quality as those provided for under existing law, the silver bullion now held in the Treasury, being the amount of the gain or seigniorage derived from the purchases of silver bullion by the Treasury under the act of July 14, 1890, amounting to the sum of $42,000,000; said moneys so coined to be immediately available for payment of expenditures on account of the present war with Spain.

ISSUE OF SILVER CERTIFICATES.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby further authorized to immediately issue, in advance of the coinage of said seigniorage aforesaid, silver certificates of similar design and denominations, and of the same quality, payable and redeemable in like manner as those authorized by law, in such sums as may, from time to time, be needed for said war expenditures, not exceeding in all the total amount of said seigniorage so held in the Treasury.

ISSUE OF UNITED STATES NOTES.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, for the purpose of meeting and defraying the expenditures made necessary by reason of the existing war against Spain, to prepare and issue, on the credit of the United States of America, from time to time as the same may be needed, during the next fiscal year, United States legal-tender notes to the amount of $150,000,000, which notes shall be of like denominations, and of the same legal-tender quality, and shall be payable and redeemable and reissuable in the same manner as the three hundred and forty-six millions of such notes now outstanding, as described and mentioned in the act of Congress of May 31, 1878, said notes when first issued to be expended only upon the war account aforesaid, and said notes shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority.

Mr. ALDRICH. I offer the provision which I send to the desk as a substitute for the provision reported from the committee, commencing on page 74, line 15, and ending on page 76, line 2.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the committee amendment beginning on page 74, line 14, it is proposed to insert:

LOANS.

SEC. 27. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow from time to time, at a rate of interest not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, such sum or sums as, in his judgment, may be necessary to meet public expenditures, and to issue therefor certificates of indebtedness in such form as he may prescribe and in denominations of $50 or some multiple of that sum; and each certificate so issued shall be payable, with the interest accrued thereon, at such time, not exceeding one year from the date of its issue, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the certificates of indebtedness authorized by this section shall from time to time be first offered whenever practicable at popular subscription under such regulations, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, as will give opportunity to the citizens of the United States to participate in the subscriptions to such certificates: Provided further, That the amount of such certificates outstanding shall at no time exceed $100,000,000; and that at least fifty millions of said certificates herein authorized shall be issued before any of the bonds provided for in this act shall be issued, sold, or disposed of, and the provisions of existing law respecting counterfeiting and other fraudulent practices are hereby extended to the bonds and certificates of indebtedness authorized by this act.

SEC. 28. Mr. CULLOM. I desire to offer an amendment. I do not insist that it shall be acted upon at this time, but I should like to have it read and printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

That whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting directly or indirectly to the United States the articles of merchandise mentioned in the first paragraph of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, or the articles mentioned in paragraphs 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, and 425 of the first section of said act, or any of them, shall have imposed duties or other exactions, or carried into effect decrees or orders, which are prohibitive or destructive of any important part of the export trade of the United States to such country in articles which are the products of the soil or industry of the United States, and the President shall communicate such action to Congress, and if a just reciprocity of trade be not otherwise secured with such country to the satisfaction of the President, the duties to be collected upon the articles of merchandise described in said paragraphs, or upon such of them as the President shall decide to be a reciprocal equivalent, being the product of the soil or industry of such country and imported into the United States, shall be increased by the amount of 50 per cent thereof, such increase to take effect from the date of the President's proclamation thereof and to continue until he shall by proclamation declare the suspension thereof; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall make all needful and proper regulations for giving effect to the same.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I desire to say merely a word. Some time ago I presented a petition, signed by a large number of business men, referring especially to the situation between this Government and France, perhaps, with reference to the treatment of some of our agricultural products, whose introduction is now prohibited by the Government of France, as I understand. I submit the amendment now, not with the purpose of having it taken up for consideration at this time, because I have understood that there is a probability that the question will be settled between this Government and France, so that the duty on our provisions will not be prohibitory, but I desire that it shall be laid upon the table for the present, to enable us to see whether any action will be necessary with reference to it later on.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALDRICH. I presume that Senators upon the other side of the Chamber are not quite ready to dispose of these amendments; and if no Senator proposes to discuss them to-night, it might, perhaps, be well for us to lay the bill aside and proceed to the consideration of executive business.

I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. I will state that the committee intend to have a session to-morrow and to consider some of the contested questions arising under the bill, with a view, perhaps, to concluding action on them Monday.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to ask if the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island is in print?

Mr. FRYE. It is printed in the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. As the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] suggests to me, it is the opinion of the committee that it will expedite the consideration of the bill for the Senate to adjourn until Monday, in order to enable the committee to continue its work.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 23, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 21st instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 3105) to correct the military record of Peter Buckley;

An act (S. 3143) to establish an assay office at Seattle, Wash.;

An act (S. 3953) to provide an American register for the steamer Catania; and

An act (S. 4582) to provide an American register for the steamship Centennial.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 1887) granting an increase of pension to Russell R. King.

SCHOOL LANDS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. WILSON. If the morning business is over, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 4192) to make certain grants of land to the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Washington will yield to me, that we may make some progress with the war revenue bill.

Mr. WILSON. At the request of the Senator from Iowa, I will yield, that the unfinished business, namely, the revenue bill, may be proceeded with; but I give notice that at the first opportunity I shall desire to call up this bill relative to certain school lands in the Territory of New Mexico.

The passage of the bill is exceedingly important to the people of that Territory in order that their school lands may be preserved and certain selections made at a date as early as possible; and as I have amended the bill by order of the Committee on Public Lands in several places, it will have to be returned to the House for their consideration. I hope to have within a day or two an opportunity to call the bill up for its consideration and, I trust, its passage by the Senate.

WAR REVENUE BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 19100, being the war revenue bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

Mr. ALLISON. At the adjournment on Friday the reading of the bill was completed, and the pending question was upon the last provision respecting bonds, etc.; but for the convenience of the Senate it has been agreed by those members of the Finance Committee who have charge of the bill that amendment No. 177 and the cognate amendments shall be taken up and considered and disposed of at this time. I hope that that will be the course of procedure. The amendments have been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY] has offered an amendment to the text of that amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment of the committee begins on page 59.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY] to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 63, line 21, after the word "shareholders," insert:

Limited liability commercial partnerships, or corporations, and companies or corporations of limited liability conducting planting or farming business, or preparing for market products of the soil.

Mr. ALLISON. That is an amendment to the amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I desire to address myself to a general consideration of the bill now before the Senate.

It is needless, in this connection, to discuss the question of the responsibility for the war with Spain. My conviction has been that if the resolution recognizing the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents which passed the United States Senate on May 20, 1897, had been acted on in the other House of Congress, and received the signature of the President, or if the President had issued an independent proclamation recognizing this belligerency during the spring, summer, or fall of 1897, further action on the part of the United States Government would not have been necessary.

But all this is past. The nation has declared for intervention upon the theater of the Cuban struggle, for the independence of the Cuban people, and for war as a necessary means to establish that independence and quell conditions of disorder upon the island. All this we have done not as a matter of preference, but because all other means had failed. War being declared, all previous divisions have been merged in the determination to conduct it with decision, promptitude, and effect. There would be no patriotism, no prestige, there would not even be economy, in a less vigorous course.

Money is necessary, and by the pending bill it is proposed to raise this money.

In order to steer our course with steadiness it is necessary to understand clearly the necessities of the Treasury at this time. To do this we must first fix the amount of our probable expenses, and then we must estimate the resources on hand which can be utilized. When we find the difference between what we have and what we need, we should vigorously set ourselves to the task of raising that amount. There should be no go-lucky dependence on the chances of the future to carry us through. It would be childish to shrink from the responsibility of our situation.

Mr. President, I cheerfully recognize the difficulties of our position. For example, it is well-nigh impossible to make any exact estimate of our probable expenses. The duration of the war, the extent to which our land forces will be called into active operation, and other hidden factors, throw a doubt upon all calculations which are offered in this connection.

On that account, though the estimates of the heads of the War and Navy Departments seem exaggerated, yet, for the purpose of this discussion, I propose to accept them.

My own opinion is that the war with Spain will be terminated before Congress meets in regular session in next December. In any event, the outlook will be greatly cleared up by that time, and there is no real occasion now to provide for contingencies which may be expected to arise at a date later than the next session of Congress.

But that there may be no misunderstanding as to our earnestness in this struggle, I join in that view of the case which suggests that we should so legislate on this bill as to meet the probable demands up to July 1, 1899.

What are those probable demands? What expenditures will be necessary to support our military and naval operations during the next fourteen months? It may be interesting in this connection to give a table showing the disbursements of the War and Navy Departments during our civil war. I refer to the disbursements for the four years beginning July 1, 1861, and ending June 30, 1865, which were as follows—

Mr. SPOONER. That was on a greenback basis.

Mr. CHILTON. Yes; greenbacks were paid out, especially during the latter part of the war. Perhaps during the first year greenbacks had not materially depreciated.

The table referred to is as follows:

War expenses of United States during civil war.

Fiscal year ending June 30—	War Department.	Navy Department.
1861	$280,173,542.29	$42,640,253.09
1862	603,814,411.82	65,261,228.31
1863	690,391,048.65	85,704,063.74
1864	1,030,090,400.06	122,617,434.07

Mr. CHILTON. The records show that the number of soldiers and seamen enlisted by the United States was more than 500,000 in December, 1861, and increased from time to time until there were about 1,100,000 at the close of the war.

When it is remembered that the military and naval operations from 1861 to 1865 covered an immense area, stretching 2,000 miles from north to south and 1,500 miles from east to west, employing a vastly greater number of men than are contemplated as necessary to be used in the war with Spain, it seems to me that we are starting out on a basis of extreme liberality to make provision for an expenditure greater than $25,000,000 a month. That sum, I believe, has been estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House to be sufficient to cover all probable disbursements.

But dismissing all differences of opinion on this subject, I shall take the sums described by the Senator from Iowa as the true figures to be used on one side of the ledger. It will then remain for us to determine how we shall raise the money necessary to meet all demands and balance our books by July 1, 1899.

In considering the details of the prospective outlay, let us take as a first item the War Department estimate of $150,000,000. This was stated by the Secretary of War to be large enough to cover additions to the Regular Army. Some allusion has been made to additional expenses made necessary on account of the expedition to the Philippine Islands, but no estimate to cover this supposed increase has been offered, nor do I see any reason why it should add very largely to the expense of maintaining our soldiers.

All the estimates which have been made of course look to the sending of our Army to Cuba and elsewhere, and I have not the slightest doubt that the estimates of the War and Navy Departments which have been tabulated are calculated on a scale of liberality which under a frugal administration of affairs will cover the probable developments in every part of the world.

The above items, it will be understood, refer to extraordinary expenses only; that is, to expenses made necessary by the war footing upon which we now rest.

The Senator from Iowa in his speech calls our attention to the probability of a deficiency in the ordinary expenses of the Government for the present fiscal year. He argues that even under the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury there will only be a surplus of $2,000,000, and gives it as his opinion that the receipts from customs will fall $20,000,000 below the amount Secretary Gage estimates. This will leave a deficiency of $18,000,000 in the revenues of the country on a peace footing, and we are asked not to ignore this claim upon our attention. It is proper to state, however, that no such appeal was made in the Finance Committee in connection with the preparation of this bill.

It seems that at last we have a public confession that the much-vaunted Dingley bill which was passed less than a year ago has failed as a means of supplying the Government with revenue. This failure has been sweeping, and in the very nature of the law. It is believed that the receipts will fall $70,000,000 below the demands of the current fiscal year.

The exposure of the celebrated Dingley bill would have been more complete but for the fact that there has been received from the foreclosure proceedings against the Union Pacific Railroad and the Kansas Pacific Railroad about $39,000,000 in excess of the amount of the bonds against these roads which the Government has so far paid, and this extraordinary receipt by our Treasury has tended to hide from public attention the magnitude of the deficit which the Dingley bill will produce. Next year and the year after there will be no such windfall to save from public shame the great Republican remedy of a protective tariff.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Texas permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. What has the alleged failure of the Dingley bill to do with what we ought to do as to the war revenue bill?

Mr. CHILTON. I mention that only to thank our friends on the other side for giving us an illustration of the old principle, that a public, honest confession is good for the soul.

Mr. SPOONER. It is for political effect only, then.

Mr. CHILTON. When we were considering this bill in committee, when we were undertaking to fix the amount of revenue that Congress could raise, there was no suggestion that we should also make provision for defects in Republican peace policies, and hence I think this new claim should not escape comment.

I cheerfully grant that we should meet all demands, whether of peace or war, but I do say that the people should not be blinded by the assumption that the entire sum to be raised is due to the condition of war which now exists between this country and Spain.

With this explanation I shall add in the deficiency of $18,000,000 which is expected to arise from next year's operation of the Dingley bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will also remember I stated that because of war conditions the natural and normal inflow of revenue from our imports would be disturbed, and that because of that I believed the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury for next year were too low.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator from Texas permit a statement there?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I know as a fact that in the collection district in my State the revenues had increased over a year or two years ago some $64,000,000, and I am in receipt of a letter this morning stating that those revenues have fallen off by reason of the war.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the war may or may not diminish the ordinary revenues during the next fiscal year. That is conjectural. In my judgment there would be no reason for a deficiency of revenues arising from a condition of war if you would increase the circulating medium so as to provide the people with more money with which to transact and develop business.

But, sir, regardless of that question, what will be said concerning the deficiency in the receipts under the Dingley bill for the present fiscal year? The current deficiency is much greater than that which the Senator from Iowa figures for the next fiscal year.

But, Mr. President, as I have said, I accept the figures of the Senator from Iowa and I admit that we should provide for this newly discovered deficiency of $18,000,000 which he estimates.

Now, let us tabulate the estimates of extraordinary expenditures:

WAR APPROPRIATIONS.
Army fortifications and Navy act, May 4, 1898.....	$35,700,000
Fortifications, extra.....	4,000,000
Naval act, increase over 1898 for war purposes.....	28,100,000
Naval deficiencies, 1898, for war purposes.....	23,275,000
Naval establishment for 1899, additional.....	75,000,000
Naval auxiliary bill.....	4,000,000
Immune bill and engineer bill, Army.....	15,000,000
Army for 1899, additional.....	150,923,527
Total appropriations on account of war.....	329,998,527
Ordinary deficiency.....	18,000,000
Grand total.....	347,998,527

Bear in mind that these figures are those made by the authorities of the Administration and indorsed by the Senator from Iowa, and certainly no one can claim that they are too scanty to meet the emergency.

I have left out of this table one item which he included, to wit, the fifty-million appropriation which we made March 9. There was no suggestion at the time it was voted that we would be obliged to levy taxes to meet it, and it should be charged against the funds on hand in the Treasury.

So now we start upon the basis that by this revenue bill pending before the Senate we must raise $347,998,527.

This is stretching probable expenditures to the very limit of reasonable calculation. For example, there is included in the Navy estimate, which I have allowed, $20,000,000 of which the Secretary of the Navy says: "This item is entirely indefinite." It is intended by the Secretary of the Navy to cover contingencies which may never occur and ought really to have little influence in our calculations.

There is thrust upon our attention for the first time in the speech of the Senator from Iowa delivered here after the bill was reported the claim that we should also raise money by this bill to pay the $50,000,000 appropriation of March 8 last.

What do you expect to do with the money now on hand in the Treasury? The fact is that a large part of the fifty millions referred to has already been paid out and the balance will be paid out of cash on hand as fast as vouchers are properly presented.

In the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury before the Finance Committee he stated the existing Treasury condition to be as follows:

Cash in Treasury.....	$271,717,538.36
Against this sum he claimed there was to be charged sundry items as follows:
For matured debt not yet presented.....	$1,293,780.20
The fund held in trust for the redemption of national bank notes.....	32,612,218.50
The national bank 5 per cent redemption fund, which is another fund.....	8,214,272.11
Outstanding checks and drafts.....	5,826,068.89
Balance subject to check by disbursing officers.....	32,330,702.59
Post-Office Department account.....	4,170,147.61
An aggregate of certain miscellaneous items.....	1,985,700.15
Also bonds and interest paid during the month which have not been transferred on books.....	5,210,482.25

Available net balance..... 179,832,472.70

It must be noted that two of the items which the Secretary of the Treasury charges as deductions from the cash on hand refer to funds on hand for the redemption of national bank notes. One of these, known as the 5 per cent redemption fund, is properly deducted, but the other item, amounting to $32,612,218.50, is, according to propriety and law, as much subject to disbursement as any other money in the Treasury. There is no reason whatever for separating it from the cash resources of the Government. Congress passed an act July 14, 1890, to cover that deposit into the general fund. One of the sections of this act of 1890 read as follows:

Sec. 6. That upon the passage of this act the balances standing with the Treasurer of the United States to the respective credits of national banks for deposits made to redeem the circulating notes of such banks, and all deposits thereafter received for like purpose, shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt, and the Treasury of the United States shall redeem from the general cash in the Treasury the circulating notes of said banks which may come into his possession subject to redemption.

The Secretary might as well keep a dollar on hand for every outstanding greenback dollar as to keep this money on hand to redeem outstanding national-bank notes. If these bank notes are ever presented for redemption, it will be only in small amounts and from time to time. It would be a great abuse of authority and judgment to lock up still more money from general circulation and practically increase the Treasury reserve to a still greater sum than one hundred millions.

All this was considered when the law was passed covering this fund into the current cash of the Treasury, and an attempt to reopen that question now would seem to expose all the calculations of the Secretary of the Treasury to the suspicion that they are founded not upon a desire to exhibit faithfully the true needs of the war situation, but rather to furnish a pretext for a bond issue.

The Secretary of the Treasury claims, also, that he has on hand $12,000,000 fractional silver coin, of which a large portion is so worn that it can not be put out. He does not say how much of this coin is in an uncurrent condition, but in any event he could readily and cheaply have it recoined under the terms of existing law, and it is self-evident that a great deal of fractional silver will be needed in the disbursements connected with Army and Navy operations.

Making the calculations in the case from the standpoint of one who desires to provide every dollar which is necessary for present or probable demands upon the Government, but who does not desire to make a scare simply for the purpose of intimidating Congress into voting for a bond issue, the $32,000,000 above referred to should be added to the available balance as struck by the Secretary of the Treasury. This would leave an available net balance of $212,172,175.20. From this should be deducted the amount unpaid out of the fifty-million appropriation at the time the Secretary of the Treasury made his statement, to wit, $36,459,341.57.

I think it is also fair to deduct $14,000,000 Union Pacific Railroad bonds which will fall due on the 1st day of January next.

Making these two deductions, there is a safe cash resource in the Treasury of $182,712,833.63, or $62,000,000 in excess of the gold reserve. Indeed, if you count out the fourteen millions of fractional silver of which the Secretary of the Treasury makes mention, there is still a surplus of $48,000,000 over and beyond the reserve. If there is any fault in these figures, I should be glad for any champion of a bond issue to point it out.

I am aware that in the figures made by the Secretary of the Treasury before the Finance Committee he made a showing which left our Treasury situation more precarious, but that showing was based on the proposition that the national-bank fund should be treated as a reserve, and, secondly, on the theory that the deficiency appropriations for the Army and Navy for this fiscal year were also to be deducted.

But as we are providing for these deficiencies in the pending revenue bill, it would be totally inadmissible to treat them also as a charge against existing cash. In like manner, as I have counted the fifty-million appropriation as a charge against the existing cash in the Treasury, it would be equally inadmissible to follow the Senator from Iowa in counting that appropriation as a part of the sum necessary to be raised by this bill.

Now, to combine in a few words a statement representing both our present cash resources and our needs to be met by this bill, we find, as I have stated, first, the cash on hand over and above the gold reserve to be $62,000,000. This surplus will give the Treasury a greater working balance than the amount advised by the Secretary himself. Second, that we must raise, according to the figures of those who have presented the most expanded calculations, the sum of $347,998,527. With this basis fixed, we come to consider how much the bill before the Senate will probably raise.

We will begin by taking up the section levying taxes.

The first item of our bill is the tax on fermented liquors, or, as it is commonly called, the beer tax. The House bill raised this tax from $1 to $2 a barrel, and the estimate made as to the new revenue thus to be realized was $33,000,000. The Senate committee changed this section slightly, and has increased the rebate on account of spoiled beer from 5 to 7½ per cent. I do not think these changes can possibly cut off more than two or three million dollars of expected revenue. The Senator from Iowa estimates that this section as it now stands will bring an increase of $30,000,000. This seems to me to be a safe conclusion.

The next item of the bill, as amended by the Finance Committee, is the license tax on bankers, brokers, insurance agents, theaters, circuses, bowling alleys, and billiard parlors. I think the estimates of the Senator from Iowa on these heads are all fair, except that on theaters and shows, which he puts at $1,800,000. The revenue from that source should not, in my judgment, be put at more than $1,000,000.

The next item of the bill is that pertaining to tobacco and snuff. The House bill was estimated to raise $25,000,000 from this source. This estimate was divided as follows: Fifteen million dollars from tobacco, $5,000,000 from cigars and cigarettes, and $5,000,000 from the occupation tax of $4.80 per year levied on small sellers of tobacco. The Senate committee eliminated the tax on small tobacco dealers.

We also eliminated the tax on tobacco now in the hands of dealers throughout the country. There are strong reasons for imposing a tax on existing stocks whenever an increase of rate is provided, because otherwise the fortunate merchant who has stocked up with a commodity upon which an additional tax is imposed will possess a great advantage over his neighbor who buys his goods after the law goes into effect. This principle has been so far recognized in former laws that when a reduced tax on tobacco has been provided it has been deemed the duty of the Government to refund to those who had already bought tax-paid goods the difference which their more fortunate competitors would enjoy in buying later.

But in this case of increase there seemed so many practical difficulties, so much of irritation to the people and expense to the Government, connected with an investigation of every little store in every little hamlet of the United States to find out how much tax should be collected from each holder of tobacco, that the committee deemed it wisest to set aside the strong reasons which suggest themselves in favor of a tax on the tobacco stocks now on hand.

The majority of the committee also reduced the tax on cigars and cigarettes as levied by the House bill. Striking out the $4.80 annual tax on small dealers, estimated to produce $5,000,000, and the tax on stocks of tobacco on hand, and the reduction on cigars and cigarettes, the majority of the committee originally undertook to make up for the net loss on the schedule by increasing the rate on tobacco hereafter manufactured from 12 to 16 cents per pound. The committee has agreed, however, to restore the House rate, and I feel sure the Senate will concur in the conclusion that to raise the tobacco tax from 6 cents a pound to 12 cents a pound is all that should be exacted of that particular industry.

The Senator from Iowa estimated that after computing the changes made in the tobacco schedule there will be raised from two to three million dollars more than the House bill would have carried, or, say, $38,000,000 new revenue from the tobacco trade. Having now concluded to leave the tobacco tax at the House figures, and having stricken out $5,000,000 occupation taxes on small dealers and $2,000,000 tax on stocks on hand, there will be a net reduction from the House estimate of $7,000,000. Therefore the new revenue to be expected from the schedule will be $18,000,000, instead of $25,000,000 as estimated in the House.

Mr. ALLISON. Eighteen million dollars of increased revenue?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes; increased revenue—I am speaking of increased revenue always. Therefore, instead of $28,000,000, as the Senator estimated in his opening speech, make these figures $18,000,000.

The next sections of the bill are those which relate to stamp taxes on documents. I believe the stamp taxes levied by the House bill were estimated by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to produce $35,000,000.

It seems to me there is very wide discrepancy between this estimate and that offered by the Senator from Iowa. True, the House bill has received very large additions by the Senate amendments. It seems to me, however, that the additions will not foot up a sum so considerable as that which the Senator from Iowa calculates. I think his estimates are far too high in some cases, especially in the case of tax on receipts and proprietary preparations. His figures are as follows:

Stamp taxes:
Sales of stocks, bonds, merchandise, etc.....	$10,000,000
Bank checks.....	5,000,000
Bills of exchange (inland), promissory notes, etc.....	1,500,000
Bills of exchange (foreign), letters of credit, etc.....	500,000
Express and freight, covering all bills of lading.....	10,000,000
Life insurance.....	1,226,323
Mortgages.....	2,041,599
All other in Schedule B, including tax on receipts, say.....	28,000,000
Proprietary preparations and perfumery.....	20,000,000
Chewing gum.....	1,000,000
Total.....	79,267,923

Taking all the items enumerated in Schedule A and Schedule B, I believe they will fall $20,000,000 short of the figures given in the above addition.

The tax on legacies, as stated by the Senator from Iowa, is likely to produce $9,275,475. It seems to me this is full high, though of course an estimate on this subject is largely a matter of guesswork.

Accepting all the estimates of the Senator from Iowa, except in the minor item of theaters and the very considerable item of stamp taxes, I will venture to estimate that the additional Treasury receipts from subjects of taxation which have been described during the next fiscal year will foot up as follows:

Beer and other fermented liquors.....	$30,000,000
Bankers.....	2,394,000
Brokers of all sorts.....	1,713,494
Theaters, circuses, and other exhibitions.....	1,000,000
Bowling alleys and billiard tables.....	166,967
Tobacco, snuff, cigars, and cigarettes.....	12,000,000
New stamp taxes.....	60,000,000
Legacies.....	9,275,475

Or a total of receipts from items about which there is no grave difference in the committee of $123,550,536. This leaves us to consider the other items of taxation included in this bill which are strongly contested by the Republican minority of the committee.

First, take the excise tax on certain enumerated corporations, to wit, railroad, street railroad, sleeping-car, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal-boat, and other vessels, stage coaches, etc., employed in the business of transporting passengers or freight for hire, including express companies. This is estimated by the Senator from Iowa to produce $5,000,000, and I am inclined to think that the estimate is fair.

The receipts from telegraph companies he estimates at $75,000, and adding, say, $25,000 from telephone companies, we have $100,000. The receipts from insurance companies are stated by the Senator from Iowa at a sum between two and three million dollars, say $2,000,000. He also estimates the tax upon deposits in banks at $15,000,000. This, I think, is too high. I would put it at $12,000,000 at the outside. I think $10,000,000 would really be a safer estimate.

Then we come to the general tax on corporations. This tax, instead of producing $45,000,000, as estimated by the Senator from Iowa, will, in my judgment, if levied, not produce a return in excess of $30,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. From forty to forty-five million dollars.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not think it will produce more than $30,000,000. I think that is an outside estimate.

Now add together all the items of taxation advocated by the Republican members of the Finance Committee, and the tax on bank deposits, railroad companies, and all other corporations, as proposed by the other members of that committee, and we have as probable receipts, in addition to revenues to be derived from existing Federal taxation, a grand total as follows:

Beer and other fermented liquors.....	$30,000,000
Bankers.....	2,394,000
Brokers of all sorts.....	1,713,494
Theaters, circuses, and other exhibitions.....	1,000,000
Bowling alleys and billiard tables.....	166,967
Tobacco, snuff, cigars, cigarettes, etc.....	12,000,000
Stamp taxes of all sorts.....	60,000,000
Legacies.....	9,275,475
Excise tax on railroad and transportation companies of all sorts, including express companies.....	5,000,000
Telegraph and telephone companies.....	100,000
Insurance companies.....	2,000,000
Bank deposits.....	12,000,000
Corporation tax.....	30,000,000

Total..... 171,950,536

In my judgment even this total sum of $171,000,000 will not be too much.

I am a believer in the doctrine that every generation ought to pay its own way, whether it be the way of a nation or the way of an individual. I believe that even the men who support by their courage and their taxes this enterprise of humanity and liberty upon which we have entered will find it cheaper and easier to shoulder the whole burden now than to distribute it over a period of twenty or thirty years in the future.

Of course there will be objections made throughout the country to these taxes, but so there are objections to all taxes. We are brought face to face with war, and must choose between the alternatives of levying taxes of which the people will complain or burdening them in other methods about which they will complain with far greater permanence and justice.

But if it be thought wisest not to raise so much, we can, by putting the tax on corporations, reduce the levies made in other directions. Instead of doubling the beer tax we might increase it by 50 per cent. This would change and reduce the above estimate by $15,000,000.

Or I would cut off the stamp tax on small notes, receipts, and other business transactions of the people.

I feel sure that the corporations can better afford a small tax on their gross receipts than many of the persons who will be reached by other items of this bill can afford to undergo the expenses and annoyance which the general introduction of a new system will bring about.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is a member of the committee which has reported this bill. What does he regard this tax—as a tax on business or a tax on corporations?

Mr. CHILTON. I regard it as a tax on the occupation or privilege of doing business as a corporation.

Mr. SPOONER. A tax on doing business as a corporation, and not on the occupation of doing business. To get at what I mean, I know a city in my State, in which on one side of a street there is a corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing furniture, and on the other side of the street is a partnership engaged in the business of manufacturing furniture. I think the business is precisely the same. Under this bill, as I understand it, the firm would not be taxed.

Mr. CHILTON. No.

Mr. SPOONER. While the corporation would be.

Mr. CHILTON. That is true.

Mr. SPOONER. Then it would be taxed because it was a corporation?

Mr. CHILTON. That is right. This is a tax on the occupation or privilege of doing business as a corporation.

Mr. SPOONER. That is, on the privilege of being a corporation?

Mr. CHILTON. Put it that way if you wish. Put it as a tax on the franchise.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not—

Mr. CHILTON. I answer the Senator that he can describe it any way he prefers.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no. I am not bandying words with my friend.

Mr. CHILTON. I understand that; but I do not care what the tax is called.

Mr. SPOONER. But I care what the Senator from Texas calls it. The Senator represents the Committee on Finance; he is on that committee, while I am not. He is a fine lawyer, and I want to know, if it is not an impertinent inquiry—

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to know what the nature of this tax is, from the Senator's standpoint. Is it a franchise tax?

Mr. CHILTON. I would not call it such.

Mr. SPOONER. What is it, then?

Mr. CHILTON. I would call it an occupation tax on the business of the corporation.

Mr. SPOONER. But, Mr. President—

Mr. CHILTON. Wait a moment. If you choose to call it an excise tax on the franchise of the corporation, I will accept that description.

Mr. SPOONER. No; it is not what I choose to call it.

Mr. CHILTON. I will defend the tax either way, and think it can be supported as a valid tax.

Mr. SPOONER. I think my friend takes a good deal of a contract, but that is for him to say. It is not what I call it, but what it is that I am trying to get at. Now, he admits that it is not a tax on business, as I understand, because if it is a tax on business it must be a tax without regard to the character of the concern which carries on the business. If it is a tax on the furniture business, it makes no difference who carries it on, whether a corporation or an individual or a firm.

Mr. CHILTON. No.

Mr. SPOONER. If it is a tax on the corporation for the privilege of being a corporation—in other words, a franchise tax—that involves a different consideration, of course. I ask, which is it?

Mr. CHILTON. Is the Senator through?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. CHILTON. This is no new thing with me. I have examined every decision I could find in the Supreme Court reports on this subject.

Mr. SPOONER. I know that, of course, or I would not have put the question to the Senator.

Mr. CHILTON. I would describe this tax as a tax on the occupation of the corporation. But in order to simplify the issue, let it be described as an excise tax on the franchise of the corporation.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the difference between carrying on the furniture business as a firm and carrying it on as a corporation, so far as the tax is concerned, if it be not in one case a tax on the business and in the other case, because a corporation carries it on, you tax the corporation?

Mr. CHILTON. That may be so.

Mr. SPOONER. This tax, then, is upon the privilege of being a corporation.

Mr. GRAY. A privilege you do not grant.

Mr. SPOONER. That is another thing. I want to get at what this tax is.

Mr. CHILTON. I have tried to compare, as I said, all the accessible decisions on this subject.

Mr. SPOONER. I know the Senator has, or I would not have put the question. I do not make any mistake as to the Senator's knowledge of the law or his familiarity with the decisions, and that is why I have asked whether it is a tax on the franchise to be a corporation, in other words, to carry on the occupation or the business as a corporation, as contradistinguished from carrying it on as a firm or as an individual. It is no answer for the Senator to say to me, "Settle that for yourself whichever way you choose. I admit the right of Congress to levy an occupation tax, a business tax, a tax on business." But that does not answer my question.

Mr. CHILTON. I will come to that directly, and then I will be pleased to have the Senator ask me any other questions.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the Senator's pardon, if I interrupted him.

Mr. CHILTON. Not at all. The reason I answer the Senator from Wisconsin that it does not matter whether you call it one thing or another is because I want to clear the track. I have learned as a lawyer how fruitless it usually is to discuss a question of phraseology or definition. As I maintain that this is a valid tax in substance, it would be obviously a waste of time for me to tarry to satisfy the Senator from Wisconsin as to the particular definition that shall be given to it.

Mr. SPOONER. My friend certainly does not mean that. Does he mean that we can tax a business carried on by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] and not tax the same business when carried on by me? Does he mean, in other words, that an excise tax need not be uniform?

Mr. MORGAN. You are not a corporation.

Mr. SPOONER. That is what I am getting at. If this is purely a corporation tax, a tax on the privilege of being a corporation or the right to be a corporation, then that is the end of my inquiry.

Mr. CHILTON. Perhaps I had better wait until I get to that branch of the discussion. But I will diverge far enough to say that Congress can tax every lawyer—

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; I admit that.

Mr. CHILTON. It can tax every railroad, it can tax every express company, it can tax every concern doing business, and every corporation. So far as I know, the Supreme Court of the United States has never intimated any contrary opinion.

Perhaps now I should resume the discussion at the point where I left it.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator need make no excuse whatever. I am always glad to have his interruptions, because, while they are sometimes misconceived, I am satisfied they always proceed from a desire to arrive at the truth.

Mr. President, a concerted effort has been made to represent the taxes on railroads, insurance companies, and other corporations as unprecedented and dangerous. Many newspapers have assailed them as the product of fanatical enmity toward the instrumentalities of modern commerce, and I have seen them described by millionaire interviewers in the New York newspapers as the outgrowth of a Democratic and Populistic combination in the United States Senate.

The tax on legacies, which was agreed to by the Republican members of the Finance Committee, could with equal justice be so denounced by the same powerful organs of opinion, and I presume the comparative immunity from criticism which that tax enjoys in the general outcry which has been raised against the principal new sections of this bill is due to the fact that it comes here under Republican patronage.

Mr. SPOONER. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Has he any doubt as a lawyer about the validity of a tax on inheritances and legacies?

Mr. CHILTON. Personally I have none. The Supreme Court of the United States sustained the tax under the old law. Of course, no one knows what changes the courts may undergo. It would be a very perilous thing to make any prophecies on that point.

Mr. SPOONER. But the point made against the validity of the tax in that case was that it was a direct tax, and the court held it was not.

Mr. CHILTON. That is true; but it does not prove anything.

Mr. SPOONER. It proves this, that in the last case as to the validity of a legacy tax or an inheritance tax before the Supreme Court of the United States, the Illinois case, they decided, as I understood the decision, first, that it was not a property tax. Does the Senator understand it in that way?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes; there was a late decision.

Mr. SPOONER. The court decided that it was not a property tax. They decided, further, that there is no natural right of inheritance, but that whether there shall be a right of inheritance or not depends entirely upon the policy of the legislation of the State, not of Congress; and that, as the State may grant it or withhold it, it may annex a condition to it of the payment of the tax, graduated as the State pleases. That is the theory on which the State inheritance tax was sustained.

I have had some difficulty about this matter. I do not say it is beyond the power of Congress; but I can not sustain the power of Congress to tax inheritances on that theory, because Congress does not grant the right of inheritance, and therefore can not annex conditions.

Mr. CHILTON. I recognize the point which the Senator from Wisconsin states. The late decision referred to was in regard to an inheritance tax imposed by a State government, hence I do not regard that case as an authority in favor of the inheritance tax carried in this bill.

But the decision I had in mind was one rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States many years ago upholding the old succession tax imposed by Congress. We have the right to assume that the Supreme Court of the United States will stand by their previous decisions. If they change them, if they overrule them—

Mr. SPOONER. The court has done so.

Mr. CHILTON. Of course; but we must assume that the court will not do so, otherwise there is no certainty in regard to any tax that may be levied in this bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I merely wish to say that my view of it has been that now in time of war, when we are under obligation to furnish the Government with money to prosecute the war, this bill is simply tendering to the Government a lot of lawsuits.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not think so.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know how they will be decided, nor does the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not know how any question will be decided. I do not know how the taxes which the Republican members of the committee propose to impose will be treated. Take the stamp taxes—

Mr. GEAR. They have been upheld.

Mr. CHILTON. That is right, and that is just what has been done with respect to the legacy tax. It has been decided by the court that stamp taxes were constitutional, and it has been decided that the legacy tax was constitutional; and we have no more right to assume that the Supreme Court of the United States will repudiate the decision in regard to the legacy tax than we have to assume that it will repudiate the decision in regard to the stamp tax or any other Federal tax.

Mr. President, whenever an effort is made to tax the people in this country who are best able to pay we always hear the hue and cry that it springs from a spirit of demagoguery. It was so with the income tax, which was fought by every method known to press and politicians in 1894, and when the rightful popular will triumphed in these halls, succeeded in subverting it in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Of all the taxes invented by mankind, the income tax is noblest in conception. It takes from those only who are confessedly able to pay. It takes only from the full stores of abundance which the labors of the whole people have contributed to build up. It takes only from that special abundance which the owner himself does not need. And it is a sad reminder how short of perfect justice American institutions reach to know that in this country, supposed to be dedicated to liberty and equality, the incomes of the rich, which in England and other monarchies of the Old World are made liable to a fair share of the burdens of government, are found to sit behind a stronghold which no necessity of peace or war can subject to the jurisdiction of Federal taxation.

No proposition to tax incomes is found in this bill, because it has not been deemed wise to complicate the questions at issue with any doubtful measures pertaining to judicial decisions. But for one, sir, I shall never lose hope that the amassed and idle fortunes of this country can be made to bear some part of the burden justly necessary to protect those fortunes, to sustain the Army and the Navy and the nation's peace, and to protect inviolable the sanctity of private property. I shall ever pray, sir, that God may inspire new judges for America who will look with a kinder eye upon the aspirations of our people, and who will see in the sanction of our great Constitution not only security of possession, but equality of burden to the accumulated wealth of the Republic.

Next in order to an income tax in intrinsic philosophic merit, I would rank the tax on legacies or distributive shares in personal property. Personal inheritances of less value than $10,000 have been exempted, because it would hardly pay for the trouble to send the taxgatherer after these small estates, and, moreover, the tax would touch a class of persons who are usually left entirely dependent.

It is a fact known of all men that the enormous personal assets owned by the rich people of this country bear no fair part of the burdens of current government. In the very nature of things personal property can more easily elude the taxgatherer than real estate; and while there are some exceptions to all rules, it is notorious that the heads of great syndicates and the kings of finance whose successful performances have dazzled all mankind rarely scruple to dodge the taxgatherer.

The very ease with which they can change their residence has produced a public sentiment in some States against taxing inheritances, on the ground that if New York, for example, should subject these great acquisitions to contribute to the expenses of State or local government, their possessors would move to New Jersey or some other State where legislators were more considerate of the privileges of acquired wealth.

Fortunately, a Federal tax on legacies will not encounter the same difficulty, and these gentlemen will have to forswear their nationality and move across the ocean if they would save their great fortunes, practically exempt from taxation during their lives, from contributing a small sum, through the medium of their executors, to the needs of the Treasury of the Union. I for one hail the tax on legacies as the welcome introduction of a high principle in Federal taxation.

Next to an income tax and the tax on inheritances, I believe the tax on corporations, which we hope to see levied by this bill, presents more elements of justice than any other tax which it contains. This case is argued in many quarters as if the American Congress were making a new departure and meddling with a field of taxation to which our history was a stranger. Attention has been already called in this debate to the fact that during the civil war a tax was collected from railroad corporations, express companies, and many other lines of business which I will not now stop to enumerate. This tax was then fixed at a percentage of gross receipts beside which the amount named in this bill seems like a mere trifle.

Here, sir, it is fixed at only one-fourth of 1 per cent. If a corporation received $100,000 a year, its contribution would be only $250 a year, and yet we hear this tax decried as if it meant confiscation of corporate property in this country. Not only so, but we are asked, with an air of triumph, if we would put a tax on an incorporated company when a private individual across the street, engaged in the same business, is subjected to no tax. We answer emphatically in the affirmative. There is no injustice and no discrimination in putting an occupation tax on all persons doing a corporate business or excise tax on corporate franchises.

Mr. WILSON. May I interrupt the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CHILTON. If it is a question, I will yield.

Mr. WILSON. I am very much obliged to the Senator. Suppose that the gross receipts of a corporation are, in round numbers, $1,000,000 and the amount paid for labor is $500,000. Will or will not the tax on the $1,000,000 of gross receipts affect the wages paid to the employees?

Mr. CHILTON. I do not think it will. I think it would be too small. If the gross receipts of the corporation are $1,000,000, the tax would be only $2,500.

Mr. WILSON. On the other hand, would it increase the rates of transportation upon products of the soil?

Mr. CHILTON. The tendency, of course, is to charge all taxes to consumers. It is probable that the consumers will pay the larger part of this tax, but it is not mathematically certain. The tax on corporations is not different from any other tax in that respect.

Mr. President, there are two great advantages which a corporation possesses over individuals engaged in the same line of business. First, in the right of perpetual succession, the ease with which the ownership of an interest in a corporation is transferred from man to man or sire to son without the embarrassment or delay which comes from the winding up of a private partnership; and second, in the exemption from personal liability which attaches to individual partners.

On account of these two great privileges of corporate existence there has grown during the last thirty years a progressive absorption of the profitable lines of industry in the United States by corporations and a consequent driving out of business of all individual competitors. This tendency has been so manifest that in some of the States of the Union the right to incorporate has been denied to some forms of business, such as mercantile and other similar establishments, because it was found that in corporate names so much capital could be combined without ultimate risk to its owners that daring and speculative methods of transacting business were set on foot to the complete destruction of the prudent and wary Jones or Smith who would meet the peril of lifelong bankruptcy if he undertook to paddle in the same waters.

But it was found that it did no good to withdraw the privilege of incorporating in one State, for forthwith the parties who desired to exploit their business in that fashion would obtain a charter in another State and return home to do business in rivalry with this same neighbor who has been so beautifully described by the Senator from Iowa. Thus business would be done not only with freedom from the restraints which a prudent merchant would employ on his own account, but the lucky corporation would enjoy the privilege of bringing or removing suits to the Federal court as a citizen of another State, while the neighbor, a private citizen, would be forced to sue his debtors in the county of their domicile.

I have known citizens of Texas who conducted business within that State, and who perhaps had never lived in any other, to transact business under a charter obtained in the State of West Virginia.

No, Mr. President; any man familiar with the ordinary business of life knows that after you have taxed corporations the small sum fixed in this bill they will still have all individual competitors at a disadvantage. The business of the country will still progress in accelerating tendency into the hands of corporation owners, and private competitors will feel the heavy hand of combination, underselling, and trade manipulation which has given the wisest thinkers of this country so much distress.

And if corporations which will be called upon to contribute a meager percentage of their receipts under the terms of this bill feel that it would be oppressive, they have but to give up their corporate name and resume the condition of advantage which Senators on the other side imagine to exist in favor of the individual doing the same line of business.

Instead of dissolving corporations, if we should be so fortunate as to put this bill into this law, the event would prove that corporations will continually grow more and more powerful. The tax is too small to constitute the slightest obstacle to the utilization of the machinery of corporations in the business of the country.

No man connected with the report of this proposition to the Senate feels the slightest hostility to corporate business in this country. I blame no man for forming a corporation when he has the privilege to do so under our laws; and when we propose to tax them, we are leading not a raid upon corporations, but an effort to apply to the field of Federal taxation principles which have long worked with equity and ease in many of the States.

It would be hardly edifying to go into the statutes of the several States to obtain details on this subject, but I will say in a word that from information which I have received almost every State in the Union has in some form or other recognized the wisdom of this principle. I believe Alabama, Colorado, Delaware, Georgia, Maine, Maryland, Minnesota, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Vermont, West Virginia, and other States have all levied similar taxes upon railroad, telegraph, insurance, express, or other incorporated companies.

It seems to me there are no practical or constitutional obstacles in the way of collecting a corporation tax for Federal purposes. I would describe the proposed tax as an excise on the occupation of doing business as a corporation, regulated by the amount of the gross receipts—in other words, such a tax as that habitually imposed in this country on manufacturers of cigars and tobacco and brought forward in this very bill which graduates the amount of the tax by the amount of the annual sales.

But even if the corporation tax now under discussion be considered an excise tax on the corporate franchise, it seems to me no sound objection to the levy can be made. It may be that a State can not levy an excise tax on a corporation created by the United States, but it does not follow that the United States can not impose such a tax on a corporation created by a State, the distinction being that as the United States possesses no general power of creating corporations, Federal corporations can only be created for governmental and not business purposes. Therefore a tax upon a Federal corporation is a tax upon a function or machine of the Federal Government.

On the other hand, State governments possess the general power of creating corporations. A tax on a State corporation is not necessarily, therefore, a tax on a function or machine of the State government. (See McCulloch vs. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 416.)

Mr. President, it will not do for gentlemen on the other side to meet this case by any mere extravagant estimates of the burden of the tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent which we have proposed, or estimates of extraordinary sums which such a percentage of taxation will produce. If one-fourth of 1 per cent be too high, make it one-eighth of 1 per cent. Then a corporation which received $100,000 annually would only pay $125 of taxes. If one-eighth of 1 per cent be too high, make it one-sixteenth of 1 per cent. Then such a corporation would only pay $62.50 a year on its gross receipts.

No man can be expected to escape the issue on the mere question of the rate of the levy. The question is broader and deeper. If the brewers are willing to come forward in this great emergency and submit to a great tax; if the tobaccoists are willing to pay a double tax without complaint; if every little note and draft and receipt and bottle of medicine is to be put under forced levy to supply our soldiers and seamen with arms and strength to vindicate American honor, shall the corporations of this country become the sovereign beneficiaries of exemption in this crisis?

The tax on bank deposits is also assailed as if it meant some sort of menace to capital or interruption to business. It is a well-known fact that this tax, though imposed during the war, was not repealed until many years after the other war taxes had disappeared from our statute books. I believe the tax on bank deposits was reduced from time to time until it finally rested at one-half of 1 per cent, and then, in a time of superabundant revenue, it was repealed altogether.

Yet a proposition to reimpose the same tax at a rate not more than half as large as the smallest sum paid by similar property in former years is presented to the Senate, and it is claimed that there is something extraordinary that this interest should be called upon to contribute even at a time when everybody must feel the pinch and pain of war. I believe that even to-day, sir, a tax on bank deposits is collected in Maine, Maryland, Rhode Island, and Vermont; and certainly there can be nothing nihilistic in a tax which has received the sanction of the controlling elements in these strongholds of protection and capital.

But, Mr. President, after we have covered the field of taxation, it is still necessary—admitted to be necessary by both sides of this Chamber—to find other resources which can be speedily applied to the constant calls of the war. This is especially true in view of the fact that there may be some delay in the collection of taxes, though I think this will be but a slight embarrassment.

Now, to provide for this deficiency two methods are proposed. One is the method suggested by the minority of the committee, composed of Republican members, to issue interest-bearing bonds outright; and the other is the method proposed by the other members of the committee, which is (1) to utilize the silver bullion which the people of this country have already paid for and which now lies idle and uncoined in the vaults of the Treasury. This silver bullion (called seigniorage) now amounts to $42,000,000, in round numbers.

A persistent effort has been made to discredit this resource of the Government and to represent those who desire to use it in this hour of need as lacking in sound financial judgment. But, Mr. President, the people of this country are not to be deceived, nor are the friends of economical administration to be put down by the false cries which the enemies of double coinage raise whenever a suggestion is ventured which looks like a recognition of the white metal.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator mentioned the sum of $42,000,000 as the amount now in the Treasury of the United States, the profit, as I understand, on certain silver purchases.

Mr. CHILTON. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I remember the transactions, the average price paid for the silver bullion was a little in excess of its present price.

Mr. CHILTON. Very likely.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the present price should be adopted as the rule, the profit would be very much greater, say, perhaps, sixty or seventy or eighty million dollars. Why not coin that? Why not issue certificates against that? Why issue certificates against anything? Why go to the expense of coining silver? If it is simply money that you want, why not add to the amount of the legal-tender notes that you propose to issue instead of coining the silver?

Mr. CHILTON. I will soon come to the very point made by the Senator from Rhode Island in regard to the price paid for the bullion.

The coinage of this seigniorage was deemed by both branches of Congress a wise and prudent use of our resources in a time of peace, and a bill was passed directing this coinage on March 15, 1894. Mr. Cleveland, as is well known, vetoed this bill; but the public sentiment of this country never accepted his reasoning as satisfactory, and it would be a method of sure and solvent financial management to take up this matter again at this time.

I note that when the vote was taken on this proposition during the Cleveland Administration, eminent Republican members of this body, such as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], and others voted in its favor. Surely the same measure is not less judicious and necessary in this time of war.

This "silver seigniorage," as it has been called—and here is the plain fact that answers the Senator from Rhode Island—is the amount of silver bullion purchased under the Sherman law of 1890 in excess of the amount necessary to coin standard silver dollars to redeem every dollar of paper issued under that act. Its coinage would furnish now, in round numbers, $42,000,000.

It has been claimed that the silver bullion on hand is worth less than the Treasury notes outstanding, and, valuing the silver as a mere uncoined commodity, that is true. But this objection is wholly outside the question, for if these Treasury notes are to be redeemed in silver, it is only necessary to back them by silver bullion enough to be coined into an equal number of dollars with the outstanding notes, and if they are to be redeemed in gold the silver bullion on hand will be useless in the process of redemption.

In either event the surplus of silver bullion now in the Treasury does not help out the redemption of the outstanding Treasury notes in the slightest degree, but merely takes up space in the vaults of the Treasury.

This surplus of unnecessary and uncoined silver can be made immediately available by the issuance of silver certificates representing the $42,000,000 of silver bullion actually on hand.

This plan will dispose of the point made by the Senator from Rhode Island, that it will take a long time to coin the silver. The silver dollars can be coined from month to month so as to redeem the certificates as fast as they are presented until the whole amount of seigniorage is converted into actual coined dollars.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. What I simply meant to say was this: In my judgment and from my standpoint, and I believe from the judgment of a large majority of the Senate, the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of the act of 1890 is held as a trust for the redemption of the Treasury notes which were issued under that act, and we have no right whatever to take any portion of it for any other purpose; that the money which you propose to issue on account of it is essentially fiat money and nothing else; and if we are to add $42,000,000 of new fiat money, or whatever sum you please, in addition to the $150,000,000 which you provide for, there is no necessity and no excuse for going to the expense of coining some so-called seigniorage which may or may not be in the Treasury.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, to what straits do gentlemen find themselves driven! We issue certificates now on gold. The laws of this country recognize the use of certificates. We have traveled up to the point where we find that even on a metallic basis of gold and silver the conveniences of modern commerce require the use of certificates to represent the gold and silver. What we propose by this provision is simply to apply to the silver seigniorage in the Treasury the same principle which is applied to gold bullion and to issue certificates representing it.

Mr. ALDRICH. But, if the Senator will permit me further, the gold certificates that are issued certify that the holder of the certificate or somebody in his behalf has deposited a gold dollar in the Treasury of the United States, and that gold dollar, or silver dollar, as the case may be, is held to pay that certificate on demand. Now, there is no silver deposited, and can be no silver deposited, in the Treasury on account of these certificates that you propose to issue. All the silver that is held there is held by an honored and sacred pledge made by the Congress of the United States that it should be held for the redemption of certain notes which are now outstanding.

Mr. CHILTON. That is unsound.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is what the law itself says on its face, and I say that to issue certificates when you have no silver deposited there is simply to issue another form of pure fiat money, and you had better issue it without the pretense of issuing it against silver.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, it would be as preposterous to say that the law which authorizes the issue of gold certificates against gold bullion in the Treasury creates fiat money as to say that a law which proposes to issue silver certificates against silver bullion in the Treasury is fiat money.

The Senator talks about the silver bullion, the seigniorage now in the Treasury, being a trust fund for the redemption of the notes issued under the Sherman law. Mr. President, as fast as the mints coin the silver bullion now in the Treasury to redeem one of the Sherman notes they also coin the seigniorage calculated on that bullion and place it in the Treasury. If the process went along just as it is now progressing, it would not be more than two or three years until every dollar of this $42,000,000 we are talking about would be converted into the United States Treasury as a clear profit.

Mr. ALLISON. They do it under the law.

Mr. CHILTON. They do it under the law. That is what I am getting at. So if we were to authorize this $42,000,000 to be coined now and the certificates to be issued on it, we would merely do to-day what would be done in the course of two or three years in the ordinary course of Treasury operations.

Mr. GEAR. As I understand the amendment, you propose to coin at once this $42,000,000. Suppose the next day or the next month there is a run on the Treasury to redeem it, what is the Senator going to do? The money is not there to meet it.

Mr. CHILTON. There are plenty of other dollars there.

Mr. GEAR. But there is no surplus in the Treasury above ten or twelve million dollars. You can not issue these certificates in advance, it seems to me.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are over 5,000,000 of silver dollars now coined under the Sherman Act.

Mr. GEAR. But you are going to issue $42,000,000 in advance; and suppose there is a run on the Treasury, how are you to pay it?

Mr. CHILTON. I endeavored to point out a few minutes ago that we had over and above the gold reserve, which is supposed to constitute a sacred fund, $62,000,000 as a working balance in the Treasury of the United States. Not only so, but if the certificates are issued the mints will operate faster than any probable demand for redemption of the silver certificates in silver dollars. Even if it did not—

Mr. GEAR. The Government would lose credit.

Mr. CHILTON. No, sir. Silver certificates would be redeemed with as much ease as the outstanding Sherman notes or the greenbacks are redeemed.

Mr. GEAR. The $62,000,000 to which the Senator referred is not applicable to the payment of the certificates. In case they are brought in they have to be paid out in dollars.

Mr. CHILTON. Secretary Gage recently stated in a letter that if it became necessary he would redeem the outstanding silver coin in gold.

Mr. GEAR. He was right.

Mr. CHILTON. Then why talk about difficulties?

Mr. GEAR. He was right, because the Government agreed to maintain all its money at a parity.

Mr. CHILTON. But I mention this to show that the same difficulty would exist whether you paid out the certificates or paid out the coined silver dollars.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Texas admits that it will be two or three years, under his own provisions, before silver can be actually coined.

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, no; you are mistaken.

Mr. ALDRICH. He proposes to issue to-morrow or the next day a certificate: "This certifies that there have been deposited in the Treasury of the United States twenty silver dollars, payable to the bearer on demand." There will be not one single silver dollar deposited there payable on demand to the holders of these certificates.

Mr. GEAR. It ought to read "on dollars to be deposited."

Mr. ALDRICH. There have been no silver dollars deposited there and there can be no silver deposited there. If we are going to issue fiat money, why not make it fiat money?

Mr. ALLISON. It is to make it fiat money.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why not release the Government of the United States from the obligation of spending money to coin silver which is in the Treasury or somewhere else?

Mr. CHILTON. You might as well talk about the gold to redeem gold certificates not being there. Suppose you issue gold certificates on gold bullion, you would not have gold dollars there, but you would have the gold with which to coin gold dollars to redeem the outstanding certificates.

Mr. ALDRICH. There are no gold certificates issued upon gold bullion. There never have been and never can be in the nature of things. There are gold certificates issued upon gold dollars, upon coin, gold deposited, and the depositor has a right to have a certificate. The Government is bound in honor to retain that gold for the payment of the certificate, and it does so as a matter of fact.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to correct the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Government always has been in the habit of issuing these certificates on the gold bullion.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is my understanding.

Mr. COCKRELL. Always.

Mr. TELLER. They are payable in gold coin. There is now on the statute book, if it has not been repealed, and I do not think it has, a provision of law that allowed the Government of the United States to issue 20 per cent in gold certificates more than the gold on deposit. It may have been repealed, but it was on the statute book for many years.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is on the statute book now, but I think it is only 15 per cent.

Mr. TELLER. It may be 15 per cent.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would be very glad to have the Senator call attention to any such act.

Mr. COCKRELL. I introduced a resolution covering the subject.

Mr. TELLER. There is not one time out of ten that the Government ever has coin enough on hand to pay the gold certificates. The people who go there do not stop to get a dollar, but they carry their bars there and deposit it and the Government gives them certificates on the bullion.

Mr. ALLISON. There was such a law, but I think the law has been repealed. I am not sure.

Mr. TELLER. I will not say that it has been repealed. I do not know whether it has been repealed. It has not been in use, I know, for a good many years. It was in operation for many years, and that, too, when the Republican party were in absolute power in every branch of Congress.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, it is unnecessary to decide the particular point as to whether 15 or 20 per cent extra in the shape of gold certificates can be issued on gold bullion; the main proposition is exactly as I stated it; that is, that gold certificates can be issued on gold bullion. The proposed amendment is simply an application of that old practice; that is, we propose to issue silver certificates on silver bullion.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator contend that there is any such provision in regard to silver bullion, whatever the fact may be as to gold?

Mr. CHILTON. I say we will now authorize it in regard to silver bullion.

Mr. ALDRICH. Put it in the law and provide that the certificates shall read that way.

Mr. CHILTON. That is exactly what we now propose to do. We hope to authorize the issue of certificates on the bullion in the Treasury, and then we want to coin the bullion from time to time and hold it to redeem the outstanding notes.

Mr. ALDRICH. The proposed act does not read that way.

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, yes.

Mr. GEAR. Then, the certificate should read "in dollars to be coined."

Mr. CHILTON. You might as well say that the gold certificate should read that way.

Mr. SPOONER. There is no difference between the commercial value of gold and the coinage value of gold.

Mr. CHILTON. But that does not touch the point at all, because all silver certificates on their face at least provide for redemption only in silver dollars.

Indeed, the Senator from Iowa seems to be very much alarmed lest there should be an extraordinary rush upon the Treasury for these silver dollars.

Mr. GEAR. There has been a rush on the Treasury—not for silver, I admit, in recent years, and I do not think it is probable there will be. However, there is liable to be a rush on the Treasury in time of war. I imagine if the Democratic amendment is adopted there will be very quickly a rush on the Treasury.

Mr. CHILTON. For silver dollars?

Mr. GEAR. No.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to correct one misapprehension under which the Senator from Rhode Island labors. I have not said it will take two or three years to coin the silver bullion representing the seigniorage and now in the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the coinage capacity of the mints of the United States?

Mr. CHILTON. It has been estimated at from four to five million dollars a month.

Mr. GEAR. Four million at the outside.

Mr. ALDRICH. I never heard anybody estimate it so high. I think three and a half million dollars is the highest.

Mr. CHILTON. Four millions is often estimated.

Mr. ALDRICH. At $4,000,000 a month, $48,000,000 a year, it would take a little over two years.

Mr. CHILTON. There are only $42,000,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. Forty-two million dollars of profit.

Mr. CHILTON. We do not propose to issue certificates against anything but the seigniorage.

Mr. ALDRICH. You propose to issue against profit before the profit accrues. There can be no profit until the original bullion is coined.

Mr. CHILTON. I thought I explained clearly that the extra bullion—the seigniorage, so called—in the Treasury does not help the outstanding Treasury notes by one farthing, because if the outstanding Treasury notes are to be redeemed in silver, then all that is needed is to keep silver enough on hand to make a silver dollar for every outstanding certificate dollar, and if these certificates are to be redeemed in gold, then the seigniorage in the Treasury is absolutely useless for purposes of redemption.

Either way you look at it, no more silver is needed in the Treasury vaults than enough to coin silver dollars in amount equal to the outstanding certificates and Treasury notes. The very fact that the seigniorage is now coined slowly from month to month and covered into the Treasury to be used for current purposes shows that it is an absolute profit in favor of the United States Government and not a trust fund to be kept there for the redemption of outstanding Treasury notes.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will permit me further, there are, say, $150,000,000 outstanding Treasury notes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Only $102,000,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. Well, there are $100,000,000 outstanding Treasury notes issued under the act of 1890. The Government of the United States is bound to redeem those notes either in gold or silver coin upon presentation to the Treasury.

Mr. SPOONER. And maintain them at parity.

Mr. ALDRICH. And maintain them at parity also. The Senator from Missouri says we have 500,000,000 uncovered silver dollars in the Treasury now.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is, of that coinage.

Mr. ALDRICH. We have $100,000,000 of Treasury notes and you will have $42,000,000 of silver certificates outstanding, and 5,000,000 silver dollars to redeem the whole.

Mr. CHILTON. We have the surplus of $62,000,000 which can be used for all purposes. The Secretary of the Treasury has already announced that he would use the gold reserve, which constitutes another surplus of $100,000,000, to redeem even the outstanding silver dollars.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Texas allow me just a moment?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I want to challenge; if it will not interrupt the Senator speaking, the statement made so positively by the Senator from Rhode Island that all of this silver is in trust for the redemption of these notes. It never has been so treated in the Department, and it is not so under the statute.

The silver bullion in the Treasury that was purchased under the act of 1890 cost the Government $97,686,516. That will coin, when coined, forty-two million more dollars than that sum. The statute requires that the Government shall keep silver bullion equivalent to the cost of the Treasury notes out, or it shall keep silver bullion to redeem them, and that is all there is. Now, then, all the Government is obliged to do is to keep silver enough to make into dollars to redeem these notes.

Mr. CHILTON. That is the statement I have made and even repeated.

Mr. TELLER. That is what it does, and there is no foundation for the statement that the $42,000,000 is a trust fund. As the Senator from Texas has said, at least every month the Government coins the seigniorage and puts it into the Treasury and distributed into general account.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from Texas will excuse me for a moment, I do not expect to agree with the Senator from Colorado as to the meaning and intent of the act of 1890. I was a member of the committee which prepared the act, and I think the Senator from Colorado was also a member of the same committee. My understanding of the purpose of that act was at the time, and has always remained since, that it was the purpose of the United States to issue only an amount of Treasury notes equal to the value of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of that act. The law said so in express terms.

Mr. TELLER. That is right.

Mr. ALDRICH. The law provided:

But no greater or less amount of such notes shall be outstanding at any time than the cost of the silver bullion and the standard silver dollars coined therefrom.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not want to be interrupted for a speech, but I am perfectly willing to yield for a question.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is all I want to say. I differ entirely from the view of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. Just a moment. The Senator does not differ with me at all. I made the statement exactly as he makes it, but I said that all the Government needed to do was to keep it and not redeem it. The Senator says the Government must keep it all. There never was any such suggestion made.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is my understanding of the law. It is my understanding of the purpose and my understanding of its intent.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I will read the law which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to receive gold bullion and issue certificates on it:

Act of June 22, 1874. Provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage.

SEC. 254. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to receive deposits of gold coin and bullion with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor, in denominations of not less than $20, each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes.

The coin and bullion deposited for or representing the certificates of deposit shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. And certificates representing coin in the Treasury may be issued in payment of interest on the public debt, which certificates, together with those issued for coin and bullion deposited, shall not at any time exceed 20 per cent beyond the amount of coin and bullion in the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. This act was passed—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CHILTON. If not for too long, I will yield; but I want to get on with my remarks.

Mr. ALDRICH. The very language the Senator read, instead of sustaining his contention, sustains the opposite contention. It says they may issue certificates as to coin and as to bullion, and that those certificates as to coin are receivable for certain public dues. That is all there is of it. They are permitted to use certificates as against bullion deposited and as against coin deposited, which shall be retained in the Treasury to pay the certificates, making it a trust fund for that purpose; and there is no such law in regard to silver bullion at all.

Mr. CHILTON. We are proposing now to enact such a law in regard to silver bullion. We recognize silver to be standard money. We believe that the silver which is now on hand in the Treasury ought to be treated as the property of the Government, and ought to be made to contribute to the help of the people of the United States in this emergency.

Mr. ALDRICH. But you propose to issue certificates, not as against the silver bullion hereafter deposited by any holder, but as to the silver bullion which is now in the Treasury and held as a sacred trust for another purpose.

Mr. CHILTON. It would not make a whit of difference as to the power of Congress and as to the expediency of the project whether the bullion was deposited before the law was passed or after the law was passed. As to its being held as a sacred trust fund, I deny that proposition in toto. The practice of the Treasury denies it, because every time silver is coined a certain part of the bullion, counted as seigniorage, is covered into the Treasury of the United States as a part of the ordinary assets of the Government.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me just a moment?

Mr. CHILTON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BACON. No; just to state the amount of seigniorage which has been so deposited.

Mr. CHILTON. All right; I will yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. The Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution adopted by the Senate, reported that between August 18, 1890, and November 1, 1893, there was coined as seigniorage and deposited to the credit of the Government $6,977,008, and between November 1, 1893, and February 1, 1898, there was coined as seigniorage and segregated from the trust fund the Senator from Rhode Island speaks of, and deposited to the credit of the Government between those dates, $11,812,635, making in all over $18,000,000 the Government has already segregated from what the Senator from Rhode Island says is a trust fund and deposited to the general credit of the Government, and in strict accordance with the letter of the law which directs that it shall be so deposited.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not contending as to the seigniorage which has already accrued—that is, where the silver dollars have already been coined by the Government—that the rule suggested should apply; but what I am contending is that there can be no seigniorage and profit until this coinage has taken place to its fullest extent, and until that has occurred the Government is bound to hold the silver bullion for the redemption of Treasury notes in accordance with the express terms of the law.

Mr. CHILTON. You know exactly how many dollars it will make. If we shall utilize it in twelve months or two years' time in the natural course of events, shall we not be permitted to use it now in order to relieve the overburdened people of this country from the great pressure of war taxation?

Besides the utilization of this seigniorage which I have described, in order to cover all contingencies and meet every argument in favor of issuing bonds the majority of the Finance Committee propose to use the borrowing power of the United States Government to the extent of $150,000,000. But we propose to borrow this money without burdening the toiling millions of America by a perpetual charge for interest.

Our method is simply to issue $150,000,000 of noninterest bearing legal-tender notes, payable on demand. It so happens that the United States possesses the power and the opportunity to borrow without interest.

In the debates which have occurred on this measure in the Senate and House I have yet to notice a definite objection to a legal-tender issue such as I have described. Is there any man who hears me that doubts that an issue of $150,000,000, in view of the resources of our country, can be made without the slightest danger of depreciation? Is there any man who doubts that every soldier and sailor and contractor would cheerfully take these notes in payment of dues which the United States has promised them?

That being so, what tangible objection to this method of borrowing money can be brought forward? If it be true that by conferring upon our national obligations the legal-tender quality we can borrow as readily as we can use interest-bearing obligations without the legal-tender quality, why should any man hesitate to use the economical rather than the expensive method?

Can it be that we are to stumble upon the question of whether Congress has the constitutional power to make its obligations legal tender? As an original proposition, I might ponder long before construing our Constitution to confer such a right upon Congress. But is nothing ever settled? Are we forever to take fright at theories which time and war and our highest courts have forever discarded into the limbo of the obsolete?

It would be as fruitful of good to go back and resume discussion of slavery, secession, or any of the other great issues connected with the civil war as to go back and resume the discussion of the power of the Government to make its obligations a legal tender.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. CHILTON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I want to ask the Senator whether anybody is raising a question as to the constitutional power of the Government to make its obligations a legal tender?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir; I have heard that question raised here in private conversation.

The original legal-tender act passed Congress by a vote made up both of Democrats and Republicans. There has been constant circulation of these issues for thirty-five years; they are used by every man in his daily transactions; they are granted on all sides to be the most convenient form of currency, and after such experience and in the face of all the events of our history it is marvelous to me that any man could be squeamish about the constitutional warrant for such a power.

It is not fiat money which is proposed, not irredeemable paper, not a paper-money basis, but solemn obligations of the Government, payable in dollars, redeemable as all the outstanding greenbacks are redeemable, and protected by all the guaranties which back up the purchasing power of the standard money of our country.

Nor is there any room now for talk about undue inflation. New silver dollars have ceased to flow into our circulation since 1893, when the purchasing clause of the Sherman law was repealed. National-bank notes are growing less in volume. The Bland Act furnished during its existence, from 1878 to 1890, nearly double the addition to the circulation that is now proposed to be made in this emergency.

The Sherman law of 1890, from the time of its enactment to its repeal, a period of nearly three years, constituted a much greater infusion of paper-money expansion than the $150,000,000 which we now advocate.

This $150,000,000 will not be paid out in a lump. It will not be paid out at all unless the Secretary of the Treasury should find it necessary, and if the war comes to a speedy conclusion it may not be necessary for him to use the power which we confer; but if they are paid out at all, they will push into the circulation gradually from month to month to make up for balances which the inadequate receipts from taxation bring about. Thus authorized, thus guaranteed, thus issued, in my judgment such an expansion of our circulating medium would have the happiest effects upon American business.

It is a matter of familiar history that when the civil war was in progress the issue of United States notes acted like magic upon the drooping spirits and the stagnated enterprises of the country. When we go back and read the prophecies of disaster which great financial authorities in the House and Senate embalmed in speeches against the first legal-tender bill, and contrast these declarations with the absolutely unanimous verdict of actual experience, who can hesitate to repeat the same financial policy under circumstances which make its safety and success ten times better assured?

All our great statesmen agree that the legal-tender notes which were put forth during the civil war constituted one of the chief agencies in carrying on that struggle. In the South these issues constituted almost the only resource, and in the North they gladdened the heart of the soldier in the field and busied the hand of the laborer at home. Immense revenues to support the Union armies were paid cheerfully because money was made more plentiful and industry quickened in every direction by the wonderful thrill of a just inflation of the circulating medium.

So, now, if I felt called upon to estimate the receipts from the tax clauses of the bill which we now propose, I would make a difference of at least 20 per cent on the estimates of revenues upon the basis of two alternatives, one the issue of bonds, and the other the issuance of United States notes.

If we put into circulation among the people from month to month an addition to the present volume of money not exceeding $150,000,000, by July 1, 1899, or, say, within the next fourteen months, we will find that the trade and industrial activities of the American people will be so quickened and multiplied that the revenues which I have estimated in the preceding tables to come from the several descriptions of taxes included in this bill will be more than 10 per cent greater than I have estimated; while, on the other hand, if the operations of the people are to be hampered by practical contraction of the circulating medium, which always accompanies the preparation and consummation of a bond issue, then I believe the revenue will be 10 per cent short of the figures which have been given.

Let us not despise the example of Secretary Chase and other great financiers of our history. Let us not reject an expedient which will enable our people to bear the sacrifices of war with the smallest possible burden. Let us put this power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. With his well-known financial views, we can depend upon him not to employ it unless there should be a real exigency.

I do not disguise from myself a recognition of the fact that it is ordinarily undesirable to increase the outstanding paper which may be presented for redemption, and I would prefer a condition where gold and silver were both coined, both invested with the money function, and each form of coinage permitted to stand upon its own weight, which I believe would be an equilibrium.

If we could establish that policy and issue gold and silver certificates to give the people the convenience of a paper representative of money, I would be glad to see all redeemable paper banished from circulation.

But it is not a question of what we would do as an original proposition, but it is a question of alternatives.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I understood the Senator to say he would be glad to see all redeemable paper banished from circulation. Would he like to substitute for that irredeemable paper?

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, no; I thought I made that clear.

In the stead of the methods with which we propose to supply our National Treasury with a full store of ready money, the Republican members of the committee offer interest-bearing bonds. I will not stop to enter at length into an examination of the sorts of bonds which they propose. You may call part of them short-time certificates.

You may talk about popular loans, or use any other contrivance to disguise the real nature of the transaction which is proposed, but at last the people will see that what you offer is an obligation which bears interest, as against what we offer, which is to utilize the silver already on hand and to issue obligations which do not bear interest. You may split your bonds up into a dollar apiece, and you may offer them at not only every post-office in the United States, but at every drug store on every corner, and they will still gravitate into the hands of great capitalists, to constitute a permanent drain upon the industry and energy of the American people.

The great trouble with the farmers and laboring people of this country is that under existing financial conditions they have no money to spare to invest in anything, or what little they have can be employed to more advantage in their neighborhood transactions than in Government bonds.

It is only the people who have great stores of idle money or who are unwilling to take the chances of ordinary business who are willing to invest their money at 3 per cent.

The people are not to be deceived by phrases. They know that every dollar of additional interest-bearing debt which is created by this Government adds a further obstacle to the natural industrial liberty of the working millions and entails upon all who come after us the curse of paying tribute to the idle and insatiable dominion of the interest-holding class. They know how the interest collected from Government bonds is compounded and ramified with all the art of modern usury, and, no matter what you call them, in their hearts the common people rebel against bonds unless you can demonstrate them to be necessary. No such demonstration can be made. They are not necessary at this stage of our struggle with Spain. They will not be necessary, I hope, at any future stage.

Mr. President, the Republican Administration now in control of our national affairs has no right to play fast and loose with the patriotism of the American people. They have no right in an hour when the awakened indignation of American hearts is concentrated upon the suffering of the Cuban people and vindicating the glory of the American flag to traffic upon that indignation and use its blind and loving intensity as a means of enforcing financial methods which will wear upon our resources long after the dawn of a glorious peace.

Mr. President, of all the devices which have ever been invented to enable a favored few to ride the scattered many with whip and spur Government bonds are the most successful. It seems as if it were the perpetual destiny of the common people to rest under some form of tribute.

In the early days of mankind actual slavery was the lot of millions, and as civilization spread its influence throughout the world the condition of the poor was tempered to the degree that a sort of feudal tenure grew up which left the common man hardly less than servant of the rich and powerful. But as time wore on and the centuries brightened with the influence of sweet religion, both the actual slave and the feudatory have passed away.

Imprisonment for debt, which was once the common practice under great institutions, has yielded in the face of advancing light, and is heard of no more amongst us forever. In this country great lawgivers have gone still further, and we find in nearly all the States liberal statutes which guarantee not only that the debtors shall be free from arrest, but that their wages and a reserve of property shall be put beyond the reach of seizure when the hour of misfortune comes.

Blessed are these reforms, for, while sometimes under cover of their benevolence fraudulent practices thrive, their general influence is to inspire patriotism and to multiply happy American homes.

But as these great developments of ennobling tendency have gone on, some others have made their appearance which threaten to counterbalance all their good results. Prominent among these is the device of national debts.

It would hardly be useful to follow the expansion of this system from the time William of Orange successfully transplanted it to the shores of England to the present day. But it is the people of the most civilized countries who have been the chief victims of the general mania to create public debt.

When Louis Napoleon ascended the throne of France the public debt of that country was already more than a billion of dollars, and after he had reigned eighteen years and was hunted a fugitive from his imperial playgrounds the debt of France, counting the German war indemnity, had risen to $5,500,000,000.

The experience of other countries has not been quite so bad, but the tables of the world's progress are full of menace to the safety of future generations.

The national debts of the world from 1862 to 1873, embracing the period of our own civil war, increased by more than $10,000,000,000; from 1873 to 1882 the increase was $3,945,000,000, and from 1882 to 1891 it was over $5,500,000,000. These figures do not include State, local, and municipal debts.

If the debts of the nations of the world represented new railroads, new canals, or other internal improvements it might be said that the countries concerned had gotten value received for the burdens which the people are compelled to endure. But the statistics show that only 12 per cent of the national debts of the world has been created or expended for industrial purposes, and the other 88 per cent has gone for war, warlike preparations, and other purposes, which mean not production, but waste.

The great danger of the situation lies in the fact that there is and can be no express limit upon a nation's power to create debt except in the discretion of the authorities who from time to time represent that nation. The statesmen of our own time have endeavored to set bounds upon the tendency of mankind to mortgage the future in order to exploit the fancies of the present, by putting into the constitutions of the several States of this Union limitations upon the power of the legislatures to create debts or issue bonds. Thus it is that we find in almost every State constitution some restriction of this sort.

In like manner the State constitutions have undertaken to limit the powers of municipalities, counties, and other local subdivisions to run into debt. These limitations indicate a wise and noble foresight.

But in the very nature of things, in our Federal system we can have no such a limitation. We do not know all the deadly perils, all the supreme trials, the future may have in store for our country, and we must keep in reserve a tremendous and dangerous magazine of power.

But this very impossibility of enforcing limitations against the Congress in dealing with this broad subject ought to teach us never to draw upon this magazine of jurisdiction until a time of sure and inevitable crisis came.

What will be the effect of issuing $600,000,000 of bonds, as proposed by the House bill, or $300,000,000, as proposed by the Republican members of the Finance Committee in the Senate? What has been the effect already of the probability of such a bond issue? Simply to withdraw rapidly from every quarter of the country money which would otherwise be employed in productive industry.

Does any man desire to borrow money to start a factory? If so, he will not obtain it as long as the capitalist with whom he is in correspondence expects to be able to use his money by investing in a Government bond. Has any company projected a new line of railroad for which they expect to find backing in New York, Boston, or other money market? If so, their enterprise will stand still until the men with the deep purse find out whether their money can be put at interest in a loan to the United States Government.

So it is with all the other industrial enterprises throughout the country. There will be doubt, delay, and disappointment just as long as the probability exists that the spare capital accumulated in the great cities can be loaned to the United States.

And so, when this money actually goes into the Treasury in exchange for Government bonds, it travels into the Treasury in large lumps and only comes out again slowly. We have noticed an example of this transaction in the case of the bond issues under Mr. Cleveland's Administration, which locked up in the Treasury a large fraction of the circulating medium of this country.

The policy of creating national debts is in every respect malign. I once read in that first book of every lawyer, Blackstone's Commentaries, a comment upon the experience of our English ancestors in making and postponing national debts which I feel tempted to quote:

If part of this debt be owing to foreigners, either they draw out of the Kingdom annually a considerable quantity of specie for the interest, or else it is made an argument to grant them unreasonable privileges in order to induce them to reside here. * * * If the whole be owing to subjects only, it is then charging the active and industrious subject who pays his share of the taxes to maintain the indolent and idle creditor who receives them. Lastly and principally, it weakens the internal strength of a state by anticipating those resources which should be reserved to defend it in case of necessity.

The interest we now pay for our debts would be nearly sufficient to maintain any war that any national motives could require. And if our ancestors in King William's time had annually paid, so long as their exigencies lasted, even a less sum than we now annually raise upon their accounts, they would in the time of war have borne no greater burdens than they have bequeathed to and settled upon their posterity in time of peace, and might have been eased the instant the exigence was over.

That great man, Gladstone, who now lies in funeral state, while tears flow from civilized men and women throughout the world, said, in a speech which he made on the occasion of the Crimean war:

Under such a system—

Referring to the borrowing system, the bond system, which is now advocated by some members of the Finance Committee—the people do not really know what they are doing. The consequences are adjourned to the future. What is desirable is that they should know the price they are called upon to pay for the benefits they expect * * * in order that that which they do they may do on intelligent and reasonable grounds, not deluding themselves at the cost of bequeathing a charge on posterity."

The warning of Mr. Gladstone is as truthful now, while the sorrow of the world is centered upon his death, as it was when uttered in the day of his prime.

A national debt not only conceals from the people the amount which a particular policy will cost, but who can measure the irritation which is fomented among the common citizens of a republic by reason of the fact that a certain part of the population are living in idleness and drawing dividends from the toil of others.

I know that some of those who have affected to despise the apprehensions of those who see in public debt a means of undoing our country have said that the same amount of money is still in circulation and that the interest charged is simply a debt of the right hand which is paid to the left.

In the first place, a large part of this interest goes out of this country into foreign lands and never returns again. But even that which is paid out to the bondholders of this country is not a mere redistribution of funds.

True, it comes from the right hand into the left, but, Mr. President, the far-away farmer is that right hand, the blacksmith or carpenter is that right hand, the industrious merchant is that right hand, printer or teacher or humble laborer is that right hand, the more than 60,000,000 people who are hewing comfort out of hard conditions, scattered through forty-five States of our Union, hold out that right hand, from which the money comes by taxation to pay the interest on these bonds.

And who puts forth the left hand into which this toil-earned money is to be dropped? The left hand is the hand of the great manufacturer, who, through the instrumentality of the protective tariff, has been able to keep out foreign competition and collect extraordinary prices from the consumers of his products.

The left hand is the hand of the oil magnate, or the great insurance president, or the sugar trust monopolist, or the telegraph king, or some other man who by a trust, a combination, a great feat of speculation, or syndicate contrivance, good or bad, has amassed a great fund of idle money which he is not willing to put into the ordinary business of the country, but must invest in some preferred security which will give him no trouble of management.

This great fund-holding interest has become a force through the world which steadily resists the reduction or payment of national debts, and by organized and aggressive efforts steadily stimulates the creation of new national debts. They are no longer satisfied with a mortgage on a farm, or a cotton factory, or rows of brick buildings, nor even railroads, but they must have a mortgage upon all the industry and all the energy of all the people in the United States.

Nothing but extreme necessity will ever prompt me to put the industry of my constituents in pawn to the fund mongers of the Old and the New World. Such a strait may come in the future, but it is not now here; and for one, when the roll is called upon the proposition to issue bonds, in large amounts or small amounts, at the Treasury, at the bank counter, or at the post-offices, for one year or ten years, I shall answer an uncompromising "No."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY].

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, line 21, after the word "shareholders," it is proposed to insert:

Limited liability commercial partnerships, or corporations, and companies or corporations of limited liability conducting planting or farming business, or preparing for market products of the soil.

Mr. ALLEN. Let the proviso be read as it will read if amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read that portion of the amendment to which the amendment to the amendment relates.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY] is absent; he has been called out, and I trust that the amendment to the amendment will be passed over until he returns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment to the amendment will be passed over. Amendment No. 177 has been read and is before the Senate for action, and the Senator from Louisiana has proposed an amendment thereto. Does the Senate desire that the whole amendment be passed over?

Mr. ALLISON. No; let the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been read.

Mr. ALLISON. I mean in connection with the text, so that we can see to what it relates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any corporation that is subjected to excise tax under section — of this act, nor to religious, educational, benevolent, eleemosynary, or cemetery corporations; municipal or other public corporations; fraternal beneficiary societies, orders, or associations operating upon the lodge system and providing for the payment of life, sick, accident, and other benefits to the members of such societies, orders, or associations, and dependents of such members; building and loan associations which make loans only to their shareholders; limited liability commercial partnerships, or corporations, and companies or corporations of limited liability conducting planting or farming business, or preparing for market products of the soil; nor shall corporations which buy and sell raw or unmanufactured domestic agricultural products be required to pay any tax with respect to such dealings except as otherwise provided in Schedule A of this act.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the pleasure of the Senate to postpone action upon the amendment until the Senator from Louisiana comes into the Chamber?

Mr. GORMAN. I think it ought to be laid aside.

Mr. CAFFERY. I ask that the amendment of my colleague may be laid aside temporarily.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendment to the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if we are still on the amendment relating to taxes on banks and corporations I desire to speak to the amendment. I do not propose to go into the question of coining the seigniorage, for I am still so far behind the latest phases of economic thought, as manifested by the Senator from Texas, that I am not able to see how you can have seigniorage until the coinage takes place. Therefore, I do not see how you can coin or issue notes against what does not exist. I shall, for this reason, confine myself simply to the proposed tax on corporations and on banks.

The object, as I take it, of the proposed tax on banks and corporations is to place a tax upon those wicked persons who have made or saved money and who are popularly supposed to be gathered together in corporations. That, of course, is a purpose with which all virtuous persons, especially those who have not been quite so successful, perhaps, in amassing money, very gladly sympathize. But it is certainly desirable that these taxes shall fall justly and equitably, and the reverse is the case here. One of the principal reasons, I understand, put forward by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] for taxes of this character was that it is desirable to reach the personal property which now largely escapes taxation and not force the taxes onto real estate, which are largely paid by farmers and by persons of comparatively small means.

It seems to me that the fact that many of the States tax banks and corporations, instead of being an argument for this tax, is an argument against it. I will take my own State as an example. We now raise from our bank and corporation tax in Massachusetts $4,777,000, of which sum $3,356,005.14 is paid out to the towns and cities in which the stockholders of the banks and corporations live. The remainder goes toward paying the expenses of the State. That State tax on banks and corporations is properly imposed, because those corporations receive from the State the great privileges of franchises and other rights conveyed by their charters. They are taxed as much as they can reasonably bear. If the National Government now imposes an additional tax upon those banks and corporations in the State, the effect will be to put such a burden upon them that the State will be obliged to give up or to reduce very largely the tax now raised from this source or else a large number of these corporations will be forced out of existence.

We have not reached that point of economic thought in my State where it is considered desirable to crush out our industrial corporations by overtaxing them, and therefore I assume that when they receive the additional burden of a national tax the State will be compelled to sacrifice what it now receives from those sources and will be obliged to repeal or very greatly reduce its bank and corporation taxes. If that is done, it can have but one effect, which will be to compel the State and municipal taxation to be raised still more largely upon real estate; that is, it will force the taxation back upon the very class of people whom it is said to be the object of this amendment to relieve.

Mr. President, it has been the consistent policy of this Government to leave certain branches of taxation to the States, and those branches, I think, should be taken up by the National Government only under the greatest stress of circumstances, a stress which does not now exist. The National Government as it is absorbs all the duties on imports and also the great excise taxes on liquors and on tobacco, and it is very proper that it should raise its revenue from those sources. It has left to the States as one of their principal sources of taxation the aggregate capital engaged in banks and corporations, and I think to take that from the States or largely reduce it will have the precise effect which it is said we desire to avoid; that is, it will force the State taxation on the class of people least able to bear a heavy direct tax.

The States and municipalities must get their money somewhere. If the National Government takes from them one field of taxation after another, they are forced back more and more to the comparatively narrow ground of real estate; and it seems to me that this is a very serious, to my mind a fatal, objection to the whole scheme of taxing banks and corporations.

There is another point about this amendment, and that is the extreme injustice, as it appears to me, with which these taxes are imposed. We tax the corporation, but we do not tax the partnership; and the Senator from Texas, on being asked if this was the intention of the bill, said that it was; that is, we propose to tax men for privileges which we do not confer and relieve other men doing perhaps the same business and with a larger profit because they do business in the form of a partnership and not of a corporation. The corporation, as a rule, is made up of many persons with small interests, whereas the great partnerships are made up, as a rule, of only two or three persons, and yet by this amendment all partnerships are exempted and all corporations are taxed.

In my State, for example, one of the largest industries, an industry whose output outranks, I think, that of cotton or almost any other, is the great leather industry, principally boots and shoes. The form which that industry has taken is very largely that of small corporations. The great corporations that exist in the textile industries do not exist in the boot and shoe and leather industry. They are carried on, as a rule, with small capital, in comparatively small subdivisions. Some of them have been incorporated for convenience in doing business. I think the larger part are still partnerships or individual owners.

The competition in the boot and shoe trade is extremely close; the margin of profit is very narrow, and it is proposed here to put a tax of a quarter of 1 per cent on the corporations engaged in the manufacture of boots and shoes and to exempt the men all around them, who are doing precisely the same business on an equal or larger capital, from all taxation whatever. The difference of a quarter of 1 per cent in that industry would have the effect of shutting out a number of the small manufactories. It creates in that great industry an immediate and most unjust discrimination.

Then, Mr. President, it is proposed to lay this tax on the gross receipts. The bill draws no distinction between the large and very profitable corporations and a small corporation which may be just struggling along and making a bare living. They all alike are to be taxed on their gross receipts.

Mr. DANIEL. Will my honorable friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Does the stamp tax make any exception as to poor people?

Mr. LODGE. It makes no exception of which I am aware.

Mr. DANIEL. May I ask the Senator if there might not possibly be some trouble with the Supreme Court if we did not make it uniform all the way up and down, as applying to all?

Mr. LODGE. I am not arguing that it shall be changed. I am pointing out the inequalities produced by this form of taxation.

Mr. DANIEL. It is not inequality when applied to everybody.

Mr. LODGE. You can make it uniform by putting the tax on the net profits. It would be just as uniform as a tax on gross receipts.

Mr. DANIEL. Nobody could ever tell what the net profits were.

Mr. LODGE. You will get your net profits by the return of the corporation, just as you will get your gross receipts from the return of the corporation. If fraud is to come in, it is as easy to evade, as easy to make a false return of gross receipts as of net profits, and if you put your tax on net profits, then it falls proportionately on the weak and on the strong, on the very successful, on the comparatively successful, and on the unsuccessful, whereas if you put it on gross receipts you strike them all alike—the rich and the poor, the small corporation, employing a few hands, and the great corporation, upon whom the tax is very light. That is why it seems to me that a tax on gross receipts is an inequitable method of reaching what we desire to reach.

It does not seem to me so fundamental an objection as the objection to taking from the State this entire branch of revenue and compelling the States and municipalities, as you will in a good many States in the Union, to raise their taxes from real estate and largely from the farming and agricultural classes and from the people who own the small houses in the manufacturing towns. But it does seem to me to be a very great objection that by taxing the gross receipts you tax the corporation not in proportion to its power to pay, but simply on the fact that it is a corporation, and that you tax it on a privilege which you do not confer, but which is conferred by somebody else. Take, for example, the matter of the tax proposed on banks.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. It is supplementary to the argument he is making. It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States, and undoubtedly correctly held, in the case of the State of California against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and other companies that the State can not tax any sort of franchise granted by the United States by act to construct and operate a railroad, because, as the court says, the power to tax involves the power to destroy. Now, following that out by a natural and legitimate line of argument, the power of Congress to tax a franchise created by the State involves the power to tax it to an extent which would destroy it.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] will remember a number of corporations in his State—I remember a number in mine—which were authorized to improve the navigability of small streams for the floating of logs to market, and all that. The common-law test of navigability, the ebb and flow of the tide, does not apply to the interior. The theory of legislation has been to organize such companies and to authorize them to build and maintain dams, to render streams navigable, and to charge enough by way of toll to reimburse and to maintain them. In the same way we will take a turnpike company, incorporated, authorized to charge a toll intended to reimburse the company for the improvement of the road and to maintain it. Congress may tax its gross earnings. It may levy a tax which will destroy the franchise, which is distinctly public and only in the interest of the people. I should like to have the Senator, as he follows his argument, deal a little bit with that phase of the question.

Mr. LODGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Wisconsin for stating a point which it seems to me in this connection is of very great importance and on which I had only touched very lightly indeed, the point that these corporations which we are now undertaking to tax receive no privileges or franchises from us. The States can not tax privileges or franchises that we give, and we are entering in with the taxing power, which, as the Senator from Wisconsin has pointed out, involves the power to destroy, to tax the privileges granted by the State. It is right and proper that the States should exact taxes for these privileges, but for us to step in and tax them also is involving the destruction possibly of the corporation, certainly of a great source of revenue upon which the States now depend.

There have been handed to me some papers which were sent to my colleague, who is now absent, which connect themselves at once with what I have been saying as to the boot and shoe industry, and I will ask that they may be made a part of my remarks:

Boston, May 21, 1898.

SIR: We send you by Adams Express to-day a petition signed by nearly all the corporations which have offices in Boston whose business is identified with the shoe and leather and kindred interests. The petition is a spontaneous protest against unjust discrimination in the proposed revenue bill now before your honorable body in imposing a tax on corporations, which, without any reason, does not propose to include firms and individuals. In behalf of corporations in this line of trade, we urge you to use every effort to defeat such unjust legislation.

We have the honor to be, respectfully, yours,

NATIONAL SHOE AND LEATHER EXCHANGE.

Hon. GEO. F. HOAR,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Here is the petition [exhibiting], signed by these firms in Boston engaged in this single industry, which are really incorporated firms, corporations of small capital compared to those of the great textile industries or the railroads, and which are discriminated against at once by this tax that imposes a burden upon them which is not imposed upon their competitors who do the same business precisely by partnerships with equal capital and equal facilities.

Mr. SPOONER. Incorporated in the exercise of a wise public policy.

Mr. LODGE. As the Senator from Wisconsin suggests to me, they were incorporated by my State and are taxed for the privilege of incorporation, and those corporations and others, as I have said, yield a revenue of $5,000,000 in Massachusetts. We have got to get it somewhere else, and it does not make any difference, so far as the individual goes, how you take it. If the National Government takes it from the corporation and the State is forced back to take it from the small real estate owner, as it will be, the small real estate owner will suffer exactly the same as if the National Government was taxing him. I ask permission to have the petition incorporated in my remarks.

[See Appendix.]

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator if the patrons of these corporations will not have to pay the tax? These are manufacturing corporations, I understand.

Mr. LODGE. They are all manufacturing corporations.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well. The tax imposed on them will simply be added to the price of the article, and the consumer of the article will have it to pay.

Mr. LODGE. Does not the Senator see that the partnerships, which in the shoe and leather industry are quite as numerous, and I think more numerous, than corporations, would not have to pay anything, and therefore they would not add it and they would cut the business right out from under these other people.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. Why does the Senator want particularly to lay a tax on the patrons of these shoe factories, who, I presume, are largely the men, women, and children, who wear shoes?

Mr. ALLEN. I have nothing to do with the tax. The Senator from Iowa is responsible. But I was going to say, in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, that in my judgment his argument does not hold good as against this tax. It only suggests the propriety of extending the tax to associations and partnerships.

Mr. SPOONER. Does not the Senator from Massachusetts answer the Senator's question?

Mr. ALLEN. I think not, directly.

Mr. SPOONER. He certainly does, if the Senator will pardon me. The Senator's question was whether the tax levied upon corporations would not be added to the price of their product.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; and in reply to that—

Mr. SPOONER. The reply is that there is no such tax levied upon individuals and firms carrying on the same business, and therefore they can not add it to the price of their product, and if a corporation carrying on that business adds the tax to the price of its product, the firms and individuals will undersell it and therefore it can not do it. It amounts to a bonus to the individual or the private partnership.

Mr. ALLEN. That is simply an indirect answer, because, as I understand, the Senator would not deny the fact that the tax is added to the price of the article manufactured, and after all the consumer must pay it.

Mr. SPOONER. That would be true, of course, if the tax was levied upon the business, and if the individual, firm, or corporation engaged in a particular business paid this tax it might perhaps be added to the price—say, upon all manufactures of shoes. But if you leave the tax upon a corporation engaged in the manufacture of shoes and not upon any partnership or any individual engaged in the manufacture of shoes, your corporation can not add the tax to the price of its product, because it would have to sell at a higher price than its competitors.

Mr. ALLEN. I was going to answer that when the Senator suggested his question to me. That does not call for any action on the part of the Senate in refusing this proposed tax, but it may call for action upon the part of the Senate to increase the tax so as to embrace the individuals and associations and partnerships for the manufacture of these articles.

Mr. SPOONER. That would be a legitimate tax.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator will have to talk loud enough to drown the conversation going on in the Chamber.

Mr. SPOONER. That would be a constitutional tax and a uniform tax, because it would be a tax upon a business. It would be a tax upon the business of manufacturing shoes and boots and the like and selling them, no matter whether it was a corporation, partnership, firm, or individual. That is not this bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I am denying all responsibility for the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, well.

Mr. ALLEN. And probably I may be acquitted—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair reminds Senators that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. I recognize that fact.

Mr. LODGE. I am delighted to have the Senator go on.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to conclude my suggestion. Then I shall certainly thank the Senator for his kindness in permitting me to interrupt him.

Mr. LODGE. I do not in the least mind interruptions.

Mr. ALLEN. It is a universal truth that this tax, levied in the first instance on the particular individual or particular corporation or partnership manufacturing these articles, must fall upon the millions of consumers of the articles.

Mr. GRAY. That is right.

Mr. LODGE. Assuming, for the purposes of the argument, that that is correct, and that the tax will come out of the consumers, then one of two things will happen, either the partnerships, which form a large part of the shoe business, will get increased profit out of the consumers by charging the same as the corporations which add the tax, or they will sell at the old rates, and the corporations which pay the tax will be unable to add it, and will be unjustly discriminated against in their business.

I took the shoe and leather industry as my special illustration, because in that industry there are no great corporations. As I pointed out in the beginning, the business is carried on by corporations and partnerships having comparatively small capital. A great many of the corporate shoe manufactories in my State have been formed by small owners. In many instances they have been formed by some men who have been engaged in the factory and who have put together their savings and have been able to start a small business in that way.

Some of the corporate shoe manufactories are very small concerns. This measure will fall upon them with crushing force, where it perhaps would not affect a great railroad or a great textile mill seriously. I think the true aim of all this taxation should be to distribute the taxes as equitably as possible. The shoe industry is but an illustration of the gross injustice it is capable of producing. What is true of corporations in this branch of industry is true in a greater or less degree of all industries and of all business where corporations exist.

When the subject of the shoe industries was renewed in the debate I had just started to say something about the banks. In this amendment a tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent on the capital of a bank in the form of a license is proposed, and also a tax of a quarter of 1 per cent on the deposits. The deposits, I understand, are a liability, not capital, and the tax is arranged to be imposed on the average of the deposits for a month. That amounts to a tax on the daily deposits of the bank.

I have a letter here from one of the largest banks of Boston, in which the president says if that form of tax on the deposits, in addition to the tax on the capital, is imposed, it is prohibitive, and that the banks will refuse deposits.

Mr. President, there is no sense in interrupting the ordinary operations of business in this way. The past is no guide in this matter. The national banks at the time of the war, with rates of interest ranging to 10 or 12 per cent, could pay easily a tax which now becomes very burdensome when the rate of interest between banks is down to $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 or $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Why disturb the machinery of business in this needless fashion?

Mr. President, this amendment also taxes the savings banks. Under the clause about deposits there is no exemption of the savings banks, and it seems to me that there is no more extreme and undesirable method of taxation than to tax the savings of the people a cent more than we can possibly help. A small tax on the savings banks of Massachusetts is now exacted by the State, and it is here proposed to add a quarter of 1 per cent tax on their deposits.

I wish in this connection to make a few statements in regard to the effect of that tax. Our savings banks in New England and in New York are not ordinary stock companies. They are solely and purely mutual. The earnings go to the depositors, and the assets of the bank are their own property. As a rule, the treasurer alone gets a salary and the trustees serve without pay. With very few exceptions, the president and the finance committee do the same. A depositor is not allowed by law to exceed $1,000 in his aggregate deposit. The rich men of the State, therefore, have no money in the savings banks. They are used entirely for the deposits of persons of very small accumulation.

The assets of the 157 savings banks of Massachusetts on the 30th of October, 1897, were $508,973,934.98, and they represented 1,384,329 depositors, an average of $364.06 for each depositor. The men with a deposit of $364 each in the savings banks are not capitalists. Those deposits represent the savings of the workmen, the farmers, the people of very small incomes and little accumulations in the State. If you take this quarter of 1 per cent on the great aggregate of their savings it comes out of the little dividend they get, which is now only about 2 or 3 per cent annually. The deposits are all there is. There is nothing else in the savings banks. There in those savings banks of Massachusetts alone you have over $500,000,000 gathered together with an average deposit of $364, and on those little deposits of $364 upon the average, and which can not by law exceed $1,000, you propose to impose a tax of one-quarter of 1 per cent. You strike a blow directly at the class which should be the last to be stricken by taxation; and you strike a blow directly against thrift and saving on the part of the great mass of the people among whom it is most desirable to encourage it.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we are in no such stress at this time that we need to come down upon the savings banks and the life policies of the mutual companies and all those methods by which the poor people of the country are enabled to make their small savings. I think to tax those accumulations of hard-earned money is one of the greatest mistakes which Congress can possibly make.

As I understand it, we are compelled by the war in which we are now engaged to raise large additional sums of money. We want to raise money enough to pay in large part as we go for the expenses now upon us. It is bad legislation, it is bad finance, to undertake to pay all the extraordinary expenses of one year by taxation. Such a policy would place a well-nigh intolerable burden upon the people and would cause an interruption to business which no intelligent legislator ought to even suggest.

We want to put on enough taxation to largely meet the expenses as they come, and to provide that by their continuance in a few years thereafter we shall wipe out the debts caused by the war which can not be met by immediate taxation, but which we wish to dispose of at the earliest time. To do that the amount of revenue proposed in the House bill was, in my judgment, amply sufficient, and with the Senate amendments, to which the whole committee agreed, more than sufficient.

We want first, in raising these increased taxes, to take all we can from luxuries, from the excise on spirituous liquors, from the excise on beer, from the duties on tobacco. Those are not the necessities of life. Those taxes are distributed all through the people, and are easily paid. In the same way we ought to impose the stamp taxation upon all. The taxes on bank checks, on deeds, on conveyances, on all the necessary papers used in business, fall on the people who can best afford to pay, because only the people of means are engaged in operations necessitating the use of such instruments. Patent medicines, perfumery, and the like also come under the class of luxuries eminently suitable for a reasonable tax.

Therefore, it seems to me that we should exhaust all those sources of revenue before we come to placing a heavy tax on the savings of the mass of the people, a heavy tax on the life insurance, which is another form of saving, and before we discriminate between the men who do their business under a corporate form and those who do it only by partnership.

Let us reach the aggregate wealth and the great capital of the country, by all means, but let us do it in such a way that we do not discriminate between men engaged in the same business, that we do not discriminate against a man of thrift who is saving his money in a savings bank or the cooperative building company, and in favor of the man who is not saving and who is not laying up his money.

Mr. President, it seems to me that there is no need at all at this time for placing this tax on banks and corporations as proposed in the amendment. It is really a blind effort to strike at those people who are supposed to be very rich and who are supposed, quite erroneously, to be gathered together in corporations. Most of the people who are gathered in corporations in reality are persons of small means, who will feel this tax severely. You will not catch the great millionaire, as you desire, in this way, but you will take from the States their normal sources of revenue and you will throw back on the mass of the people, on the farmer, on the man who owns the small house and who has his small savings—you will throw back on their shoulders the burden of State and municipal taxation, and your great millionaire will escape readily through the clumsy net which you are trying to throw about him.

APPENDIX A.

BOSTON, MASS., May 21, 1898.

APPENDIX B.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., May 19, 1898.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation this morning regarding the taxation of savings banks, and in accordance with your request, I name a few of the reasons which would seem to justify the exemption of savings banks from taxation for war-revenue purposes.

I understand that it is proposed to eliminate from the revenue bill all features which would tax the people in humble life, and for this reason building associations and the like, cooperative banks as they are called in Massachusetts, are exempt, of which there are 123 in our State. Certainly savings banks as they are established in New England and New York and particularly in Massachusetts come under this head.

Savings banks in the West and South are carried on differently, having a capital stock, and the profits are divided with the stockholders. Possibly these should be taxed the same as any other corporation paying a dividend to its stockholders, but as you are well aware, the savings banks of our Commonwealth are solely purely mutual, the earnings going to the depositors, and the assets of the banks are their property; only the treasurer, as a general thing, being paid a salary. The trustees serve without pay, and in most every case the president and finance committee do the same—very few exceptions. A depositor is not allowed by law to exceed $1,000 in his aggregate deposit, and this with accumulations can not exceed $1,600.

The assets of the 187 savings banks of Massachusetts October 30, 1897, were $303,973,954.98, representing 1,354,523 depositors' accounts, an average of $244.04. This, it seems to me, is positive proof that the savings banks of Massachusetts are owned, as you might say, by the people in humble life.

Now, if you will take the population of our State as given in 1895, the average deposit per capita is $201.57. I think, however, the average depositor's account of the assets is the fairer way to state it. The average of each account of deposits proper is $242.35.

It has been charged that the savings banks of our State are simply an asylum for the deposits of the wealthy to avoid taxation. This is not so, and the above figures with the following are conclusive, as it appears to me, on this point. The average of original deposit made (not including dividend) for the year ended October 30, 1897, was $66.34. The average withdrawal for the same period was $74.05, which included the dividends. These averages have changed but very slightly for a great many years. There were 1,248,203 deposits and 1,071,272 withdrawals last year. These figures show, without any question, how savings banks are used, and by whom. No doubt some deposits of wealthy persons are to be found, but they must be few or the average deposit would be very much larger.

By Massachusetts statute the savings banks are required every fifth year, commencing in 1889, to make a classification of the deposits made during the preceding twelve months. The classification for 1894 is as follows:

Out of the total number of 1,044,649 depositors' accounts of that year, 784,482 were of an amount less than $50 each, 910,421 of an amount less than $100 each, and 968,917 less than $200 each; that is, more than 93 per cent were less than $200.

The deposits of women, both adult and minor, were in number 480,835, amounting to $33,460,023.11, nearly one-half, both in number and amount, of the entire deposits of the year—an instructive fact as regards the use and value of the savings banks of our Commonwealth.

These facts do not materially differ from those of five years previous, viz, 1893, and indicate strongly that banks are being used almost entirely by the people of limited means and not by the wealthy.

The average earnings of the savings banks are a slight fraction above 5 per cent, and the dividends paid average a slight fraction over 4 per cent, leaving but 1 per cent—a very small margin—for all expenses, clerk hire, salaries, State taxation, amount credited to the guaranty fund semiannually, which is graded from one-eighth to one-fourth per cent. Further taxation would be a grievous burden in itself and a tax upon that class of people who ought not to pay it.

If this taxation is placed upon the savings banks, it will certainly reduce the dividends, or a higher rate will have to be paid on loans; in either case, or both, as it may possibly be, the burden comes upon the wrong parties.

To illustrate, out of nearly five hundred and four millions of assets, over two hundred and twelve millions are loaned on Massachusetts real estate, numbering 75,648 loans, 63,138 of which number are of an amount less than $3,000 each, which indicates who are the borrowers in these institutions.

All of this goes to show that in taxing savings banks corporations are not being taxed, but mutual institutions composed of women, mechanics, wage earners, and laborers of all grades.

The authority for figures given is the report of savings-bank commissioners for 1897, pages 672-5, a copy of which is on the way to your address. The accuracy of these figures I can vouch for.

Very respectfully,

E. S. CHAPIN.

HON. HENRY C. LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MR. TURLEY. Mr. President, I wish to make a few remarks on one or two features of the bill, and especially in reference to the amendment which imposes a tax on corporations.

It seems to me that there are some good reasons for justifying a tax upon corporations if we look at taxation in one of its elements as a return for benefits derived from the Government. Certainly there is a distinction in benefits received under the Government between corporations and private individuals engaged in the same business. Those benefits have already been pointed out to some extent.

It appears to me the greatest benefit that the corporation enjoys over the individual in all business transactions is the exemption from personal liability on the part of those who own the corporation. That is one of the most important benefits that any business man can possess. If the business is transacted by individuals, then every credit transaction is on the responsibility of every member interested in that business; but in the case of a corporation the owners can put in just such an amount of money, large or small, as they desire, because in most of the States there are no requirements fixing any specific amount of capital. I repeat, they can put in just such an amount as they choose and desire, and then they can push their credit to the utmost limit. When they are successful, they reap the benefit. When they are unfortunate, the creditors sustain the loss.

Then, too, corporations possess the great benefit of perpetual life. In the case of a firm, if any member dies the business must stop and be wound up and a new organization created. But if it is a corporation it goes on without any such change. Hence, it seems to me, there are good reasons why a moderate tax might be imposed on account of these peculiar benefits.

I realize that corporations may be proper subjects for State taxation. Ordinarily the State should be allowed to look to them for revenue, but my examination leads me to the conclusion, and I am not an enemy of corporations, that, taking them as a class, they do not bear their fair proportion of the burden of taxation as compared with all the other property of the country.

I examined the other day the census of 1890 on this subject. The only class of corporations as to which I could make a comparative estimate was the railroad corporations. Strange to say—that is, unless my examination was not as careful and complete as it ought to have been—when you take the great manufacturing corporations and all the other great corporations of the country and examine the census of 1890 you will find no compilation there by which you can segregate the amounts paid by those companies in taxes from their other expenses and compare them with the taxation borne by other property. But in railroad corporations that comparison can be made, and I have made it and will now submit it.

According to the census of 1890, the total valuation of all the property in the United States is $65,037,081,197. The railroad valuation as returned by the corporations themselves amounts to $9,352,943,854—that is, the steam railroads. The tax paid by steam railroads amounts to $31,943,020. The tax paid by all real and personal property, all other property, and excluding from the estimate all indirect taxes or income taxes—in other words, practically all national taxes—amounts to $507,119,876.

When you compare these statements it will be seen that the valuation of railroad property, as compared with all the property in the United States, is between 14 and 15 per cent, but the taxes paid by the railroad corporations, compared with all the taxes paid by other property, is only 5.92 per cent. They have between 14 and 15 per cent of the property. They pay between 5 and 6 per cent of the taxes.

Now, if you reduce the taxes so as to reach the rate per dollar, the tax on all other property is about 8 mills and the tax on railroad property is about 3 mills.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GRAY. May I interrupt the Senator from Tennessee a moment to ask a question? It is for information.

Mr. TURLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. In the interesting statement he has just read of the aggregate amount of railroad taxation as compared with railroad capitalization—is that the proper word?

Mr. TURLEY. Well, the valuation they put on the entire property.

Mr. GRAY. The valuation put upon it. Has the Senator included the taxes that are levied upon the shares of stock that are held in those railroads and representing that very property in the hands of individual holders?

Mr. TURLEY. I will say frankly I do not suppose that is in the estimate. The estimate is the tax on the property of the corporation, and does not, as I understand, include the tax on the owners of shares in those corporations.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TURLEY. Certainly. I will answer the Senator from Delaware a little further on.

Mr. SPOONER. I recognize in the Senator from Tennessee not only a very able lawyer, but a very just and fair legislator, and I want to ask him whether in ignoring that statement the system of taxation upon railways imposed by the States—

Mr. TURLEY. But I understand it includes all the taxes.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not misleading? Now, take my own State, which I have the honor in part to represent here. They levy a tax of 4 per cent on the gross earnings of the successful railroad corporations, which tax almost supports the State government. Is the Senator's statement such as to warrant him in saying that that tax is disproportioned at all to the tax on other property?

Mr. TURLEY. Of course I can not take up the tax in any particular State.

Mr. SPOONER. That is why I ask my friend if that gross statement or statement en masse or in solido, if I may use that expression, is not calculated to be misleading.

Mr. TURLEY. I think not, and for the reason I shall state. Of course it may be that in some particular States railroad property may pay as much as other property. If it is so in Wisconsin, I was not aware of it before. I know it is not the general case. Here is an estimate taken from the census which gives the total amount of taxation, State, county, and municipal, and also the Federal taxation. I have eliminated the Federal taxation because that does not fall directly on property. But the statement gives the general tax all over the country, and it shows the total tax paid by the railroads all over the country.

Now, when you are seeking a new subject of taxation, if you find that one-seventh—I believe 9,000,000,000 is about one-seventh of 63,000,000,000—if you find one-seventh of the total wealth of the country, taking the country from one end to the other, is paying about one-third as much taxes as it ought to pay, the question is, when you come to a general tax for the support of the Government in time of war, is not that a class of property upon which you can well lay some additional tax?

It is not a question as to whether in one particular State the railroad property in that State is assessed and taxed as high as or higher than in other States, but it is whether we here in Congress, when we are surveying the whole field and selecting a property or interest upon which to put these taxes, if we find one class of property that is not paying its fair and just proportion of all the taxes of the country, it is unreasonable to add some additional burden to that class of property.

Mr. SPOONER. If my friend will allow me a moment, and only a moment, this is what has troubled me about this question: In the State of Wisconsin, and very likely in other States, a tax of 4 per cent is levied on the gross earnings of the corporations created by the State upon their State business; and the State proposes to do, as it has thus far, its whole part in furnishing troops and supporting the Government in every way in this war.

Now, if Congress is to step in and levy an additional tax upon this source of State revenue, if it may levy one-fourth of 1 per cent, it may levy 20 per cent, and may force the State of Wisconsin to entirely change her policy, and I think other States to change their policy, and instead of levying a tax for local purposes on railway companies, it will be compelled to levy upon the property of the people. While that might be fair as to some of the States with reference to their system of taxation, it might be grossly unfair as to others.

Mr. TURLEY. Possibly that is true. I am willing to concede if any State of this Union taxes railroad property higher than other property is taxed, and we lay an unreasonable tax, as to that particular State it might be very burdensome; but when we come to levy a tax for the whole country, it is impossible to determine and control our action by the particular condition of affairs which exists in a few States, because this railroad property, if these tables are correct, can have paid its just proportion of taxes only in a very few States.

I do not suppose that any man will claim the railroad companies are paying more than they ought to pay in any State. If the fact that such property is paying as much as it ought in one or two States is to exempt it from taxation elsewhere, then it goes scot-free from its just proportion of the public burden.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, why not levy the tax on interstate commerce?

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to make an inquiry in relation to the question propounded by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. Is it not true that railroads engaged in interstate commerce have claimed exemption from State taxation on the ground that it was beyond the power of the States to regulate commerce among the States; that it was a power belonging exclusively to Congress; and on that ground have not all the interstate railroads claimed exemption and been exempted, as a matter of fact, from any tax upon any franchise or business of transportation in which those railroads were engaged?

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, I drew that distinction in my question.

Mr. TURLEY. Yes, sir; I understand that.

Mr. SPOONER. I referred to the right of Congress to tax interstate business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please address the Chair, so that their remarks can be heard. The Chair will take occasion further to state that a Senator ought not to be interrupted while on the floor without his leave.

Mr. SPOONER. I obtained leave of the Senator.

Mr. TURLEY. I was willing to yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. We can not hear in this part of the Chamber a word that is being said.

Mr. RAWLINS. The suggestion the Senator from Wisconsin made was that most of the railroads in the country who were so engaged in such interstate commerce or traffic have claimed and obtained exemption from State taxation. This may account to a certain degree for the fact that these railroads do not contribute their fair proportion in any form of taxation.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me?

Mr. TURLEY. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. I made no such suggestion as that. I only suggested to my friend from Tennessee that possibly his statement, taking no account of State taxation, might be misleading; and I said to him that in my own State—I know nothing about other States—so far as the business of our railway corporations engaged in State transportation is concerned, we tax them 4 per cent on their gross earnings, and that at times almost supports the State government.

I challenge somewhat the wisdom—and I do not hesitate to do it—of the attempt of the United States Government to impose such taxation. If it may tax one-fourth of 1 per cent, it may impose a tax of 20 per cent, thus exhausting that source of State income all over the United States, in whatever form State taxation may take, and forcing the States to resort to what is equivalent to a direct tax upon the people. Whether Congress may tax the franchise simply of a State corporation is another question.

Mr. TURLEY. I will come to that in a moment.

I repeat that I understand these tables to mean that they embrace all the taxes paid by railroads, just as the taxes paid by other property, excluding customs and direct taxes; they include State, county, city, and every other tax paid by them. On that basis it shows that they pay between 5 and 6 per cent of the taxes and own between 14 and 15 per cent of the property.

As to the interstate-commerce feature, it is true the States can not tax that. How much of railroad earnings come from interstate commerce as distinguished from State commerce I am unable to tell. My impression is that the larger part comes from interstate commerce, and that this tax in that way will mainly fall on the revenues that are not taxed anywhere else.

As to the stock feature, as to which the Senator from Delaware asks, that question applies to every form of corporate property. The shares of stock in every corporation can be taxed when they are of any value; but I might say, if you come to railroad corporations, I know very few railroads in this country whose stock is worth anything, and I expect if we had a table to show the amount of tax derived by the States from assessments made on shares of stock in railroad companies, we would find it amounted to nothing.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. TURLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. I only interrupt for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senator to the statement of the Senator from Delaware, and to make the suggestion that we can not tax the franchise and the property of a corporation and at the same time tax its stock. Taxing the stock taxes the property, and taxing the property of the corporation taxes the stock.

Mr. TURLEY. Do I understand the Senator from Nebraska to mean that we can not tax the shares of stock in the hands of shareholders, and at the same time tax the franchise?

Mr. ALLEN. You can not tax the property, which includes the franchise, and at the same moment tax the stock.

Mr. TURLEY. In the hands of the shareholders?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; in the hands of the shareholders.

Mr. TURLEY. I differ from the Senator on that point. As I understand, that can be done unless there are some peculiar legislative provisions or some special constitutional limitations.

Mr. ALLEN. That would be double taxation.

Mr. TURLEY. It may be double taxation. So is taxing a man who holds a note and taxing the man who borrows the money, in one sense, double taxation. But, as I understand, under the taxing power possessed by the Government of the United States and every State in this Union, without any exception so far as I know, shares of stock and corporate property are wholly distinct things—the corporate property belonging to the corporation, the shares of stock belonging to the individual—and the Government can tax them at the same time, taxing the shares of the shareholder and taxing the property of the corporation. If that be double taxation, it is a form of double taxation which exists under our system.

Mr. ALLEN. A certificate of stock represents the interest of a stockholder in the aggregate property. If you tax that aggregate property to its full limit, making the taxes imposed on it equal to those imposed on other property, then taxing the stock would be simply double taxation on the property.

Mr. TURLEY. The difference is that the tax in the one instance is paid by the corporation and in the other instance it is paid by the shareholder.

Mr. ALLEN. What I have said is in the light of the fact that I do not hold to what I regard as the exploded doctrine—exploded years ago—that the power to tax includes the power to destroy. That doctrine is not the doctrine of this country to-day.

Mr. TURLEY. I do not think it is practically the doctrine of this country, but it has been exercised. But undoubtedly, I suppose, an unreasonable exercise of the taxing power can result in destruction. The power to tax involves the power to destroy; but I am happy to say it is rarely ever exercised.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Tennessee that the property of a corporation may be taxed as against the corporation, and that the owners of stock may be taxed as owners of stock. While most of the States, I take it, which have taxed tangible property exempt stock in the hands of their own citizens, yet where stock is held by citizens of other States the exemption does not apply. Has the Senator estimated how much of that general mass of property and that general taxation is made up of taxes levied on the stock of corporations?

Mr. TURLEY. In the hands of the shareholders?

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes; in the hands of the shareholders.

Mr. TURLEY. I have not estimated that, and there is no table which I have ever seen by which any man can arrive at it; but I do repeat that my opinion is that it is infinitesimal so far as the railroads are concerned. I appeal to the Senator, and I appeal to all Senators on the floor, how many railroads in this country have stock which is worth enough to be returned on the books of the assessors—I mean shares in the hands of shareholders?

I do not believe enough is collected to pay for the cost of collection. I may be mistaken about it, but there is no table by which we can arrive at it accurately. I suppose, however, you can count on your fingers the railroads in this country whose stock is of any value, but there is an immense number of them the stock of which is perfectly worthless, and the tax assessor never finds it, because it is worth nothing except for voting purposes and controlling the corporation.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I think he must be laboring under a very grave misapprehension when he says you could count such corporations on your fingers.

Mr. TURLEY. That may be an exaggerated statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the little State of New Hampshire we levy a tax upon the property of railroad corporations, and we have one of the largest corporations in the country running through our State—the Boston and Maine Railroad. Then a tax of 1 per cent is levied on the stock in addition; so that there is, in a sense, already double taxation. But that is true of other property.

Mr. TURLEY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree with the Senator; but yet I really think that in our section of the country the belief is that railroad property is fairly taxed and that there is not any discrimination practiced; and fortunately with us our corporation is not one of the bankrupts of the country.

Mr. TURLEY. I am glad that that condition of affairs exists in the State from which the Senator comes. As I stated before, it may be in some of the States that they are paying their proper proportion of taxes. I have not been able to find and could not give the figures, unless I had time to go through the statistics of every State; but here is a report covering the United States from one end to the other, and taking this property as compared with other property, though you may say in one particular place or one particular State it pays its full share, when you take the entire property you find it only pays about one-third of what it ought to pay if these figures are true. That is the kind of property upon which some taxes ought to be paid for the expenses of the prosecution of this war.

Briefly, Mr. President, a few words further on another proposition which has been suggested. I do not know how earnestly it has been insisted on, but it is urged, or, at least, the question has been asked, whether the Government of the United States can tax a franchise created by a State; whether the creation of a franchise by a State is not an exercise of sovereignty which can not be taxed by any other government or sovereignty, and the question is raised whether railroad corporations can be taxed under that theory.

In the case, in 127 United States Reports, of California vs. The Central Pacific Railroad Company there is laid down the doctrine that the franchises granted by the United States to a railroad corporation can not be taxed by a State. It may be argued from that—I have heard the question suggested—that the converse of that proposition is that a franchise given to a railroad by a State can not be taxed by the United States; but when the question is examined its fallacy will be readily seen.

It has already been pointed out by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON], and the distinction is this, plain and marked: The Government of the United States can only create a corporation as a means of carrying out one of its great express powers. It has, as the Senator from Texas so well explained, no independent sovereign power of creating corporations as a distinct power from the other powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, but it can use the corporation only as a means to an end, and not make the creation of the corporation the end of the exercise of any sovereign power.

Hence it is, whenever a corporation is created by the United States, if it is a valid creation, then it becomes the means and instrumentality of carrying out one of the sovereign powers of the United States; and as such it is exempt from taxation on the part of the State or on the part of any other government, just as in the case of the Bank of the United States authority in Congress was found to create that bank under the powers to levy and collect taxes, to maintain the national defense, to carry on war, and other great powers. It was held in McCulloch vs. Maryland that a banking corporation was a legitimate and reasonable means of carrying out these powers, and hence it is that such bank could not be taxed by the State. In that decision Chief Justice Marshall used this language:

Had it been intended to grant this power—

That is, the power to create corporations—as one which should be distinct and independent, to be exercised in any case whatever, it would have found a place among the enumerated powers of the Government. But being considered merely as a means to be employed only for the purpose of carrying into execution the given powers, there could be no motive for particularly mentioning it.

Further on he says:

It has also been insisted that, as the power of taxation in the general and State governments is acknowledged to be concurrent, every argument which would sustain the right of the General Government to tax banks chartered by the States will equally sustain the right of the States to tax banks chartered by the General Government.

But the two cases are not on the same reason. The people of all the States have created the General Government, and have conferred upon it the general power of taxation. The people of all the States and the States themselves are represented in Congress, and by their representatives exercise this power. When they tax the chartered institutions of the States they tax their constituents; and these taxes must be uniform.

But when a State taxes the operations of the Government of the United States, it acts upon the institutions created not by their own constituents, but by the people over whom they claim no control. It acts upon the measure of a government created by others as well as themselves, for the benefit of others in common with themselves. The difference is that which always exists and always must exist between the action of the whole on a part and the action of a part on the whole, between the laws of a government declared to be supreme and those of a government which, when in opposition to those laws, is not supreme.

The tax in the McCulloch case was a tax on circulation.

The statute of Maryland provided that it should not be lawful for the branch bank of the United States to issue notes of any other denomination than $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500, and $1,000, and no note should be issued except upon stamped paper of 10 cents for five-dollar notes, 20 cents for ten-dollar notes, 30 cents for twenty-dollar notes, 50 cents for fifty-dollar notes, $1 for one hundred-dollar notes, $10 for five hundred-dollar notes, and $50 for one thousand-dollar notes.

In the case of Osborn vs. The Bank (9 Wheaton, 863 and 864) the State of Ohio had passed a tax intended to prohibit the Bank of the United States from doing business in that State. That would have been practically the effect of the act if it had been carried into operation.

In the case of Osborn—I again reiterate it—the court points out the distinction that it was not the fact that the bank was a corporation which prevented it from being taxed by the State, but it was by reason of the fact that certain public functions necessary to the carrying out of the great powers of the Government were vested in the bank; and it was laid down that if under a law the Secretary of the Treasury had been empowered to appoint financial agents throughout the country, clothing them with the same functions that were given the bank, but leaving them as individuals, those agents and all their official operations would have been exempt from State taxation.

Mr. LINDSAY. If the Senator will permit me, suppose the State banks have been organized by the States for the purpose of acting as financial agents for the States, can the Federal Government tax those banks any more than the State can tax the financial agents of the Federal Government?

Mr. TURLEY. I am glad the Senator has put that question to me, and I will answer it as frankly as I can. If a State organizes a State bank for State purposes and as a means of carrying out the financial schemes of the State—if it has that public character—then I agree with the Senator that it would not be subject to taxation by the United States.

Probably my own State once had a bank of that kind, and I do not know how many other States may have had such banks. We had the Bank of Tennessee, in which the State of Tennessee was probably the largest stockholder, controlled practically by the State, the officers and directors appointed by it, the bank being used by the State in the transaction of the finances of the State; but there is not a State bank now in existence that has any such characteristic. That distinction as to cases in which State banks become exempt from Federal taxation is maintained in the authorities; but, I repeat, there is not a State bank in existence now that has any such characteristic.

Mr. LINDSAY. The State of Kentucky chartered a bank, expressly declaring that it was created for that express purpose. Certain duties were imposed upon it and certain rights were given to it because of those duties being imposed upon it.

Mr. TURLEY. I am not familiar with that charter. It simply being in the charter would not make it so; but if it is practically a State institution, then I am wrong in the statement as to the State of Kentucky, but it is the only State I know of which has any such bank.

Mr. LINDSAY. Was it not simply a declaration in the charter of the Bank of the United States and not a fact?

Mr. TURLEY. That is a question that I am not now going to discuss. If it was an original question, a great deal might be said about it. I invite the attention of the Senator to the argument of Mr. Hammond and the other counsel in the Osborn case—most elaborate and learned arguments—maintaining that the Bank of the United States was really a private institution; but the Supreme Court of the United States held to the contrary, and established the doctrine which I have announced, and which doctrine is as firmly settled now in the Constitution of this country as any other question that is past and gone—as firmly settled as it is settled that the right of secession does not exist. On these questions, as original propositions, we might change our positions and argue differently; but we are compelled to accept accomplished facts.

I go now to one other case, and that is the case of Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, in 8 Wallace. That is the case in which the tax on State bank circulation was held to be constitutional. Now mark, in this case the United States imposed exactly the same kind of a tax upon State banks which the State of Maryland attempted to impose upon the Bank of the United States in the McCulloch case. As I have shown, in the McCulloch case the State imposed a tax on circulation, requiring every bill to bear a certain stamp upon it. In this case the Congress of the United States first began by imposing a small tax on all State bank circulation, increasing it until it became a 10 per cent tax, I believe; but anyhow the result of it was that we had an instance where the power to tax became the power to destroy, and the State banks of issue were driven out of existence.

Let us see what the court said on this subject in that case. It said:

Is it, then, a tax on a franchise granted by a State which Congress, upon any principle exempting the reserved powers of the States from impairment by taxation, must be held to have no authority to lay and collect?

We do not say that there may not be such a tax. It may be admitted that the reserved rights of the States, such as the right to pass laws, to give effect to laws through executive action, to administer justice through the courts, and to employ all necessary agencies for legitimate purposes of State government, are not proper subjects of the taxing power of Congress.

But it can not be admitted that franchises granted by a State are necessarily exempt from taxation, for franchises are property, often very valuable and productive property, and when not conferred for the purpose of giving effect to some reserved power of a State, seem to be as properly objects of taxation as any other property.

But in the case before us the object of taxation is not the franchise of the bank, but property created or contracts made and issued under the franchise, or power to issue bank bills. A railroad company, in the exercise of its corporate franchises, issues freight receipts, bills of lading, and passenger tickets; and it can not be doubted that the organization of railroads is quite as important to the State as the organization of banks.

But it will hardly be questioned that these contracts of the company are objects of taxation within the powers of Congress, and are not exempted by any relation to the State which granted the charter of the railroad. And it seems difficult to distinguish the taxation of notes issued for circulation from the taxation of these railroad contracts. Both descriptions of contracts are means of profit to the corporations which issue them, and both, as we think, may properly be made contributory to the public revenue.

Now, let me quote another case which is identical almost with the provisions in this bill, and that is the case of the Michigan Central Railroad vs. Slack, collector (100 U. S., 595-599), where the law requiring all railroad, canal, and similar corporations to pay 5 per cent on interest coupons and profits was sustained and held to be an excise tax on net earnings, and no doubt was expressed because of the fact that the railroad company was chartered by a State. This case is cited and distinguished in the income-tax cases and not overruled.

If you take the bill pending here, we have an excise tax placed in terms upon the gross revenue, on the gross income of railroads. There a similar tax imposed on the net income of this class of corporations is sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, held to be constitutional, and not objectionable for any want of uniformity.

Mr. LINDSAY. That was before the recent income-tax decision.

Mr. TURLEY. But this case is especially referred to in the case of Pollock, and it is held not to be an income tax and not subject to the objections which were held good as against the income-tax law. It is held to be an excise tax placed upon a class of individuals or a class of corporations, and that is the difference, as I understand it, between an excise tax and an income tax. If the income tax is general, if it falls upon everybody, if it falls on the property of everybody, if it falls on all the property, real or personal, of the country, then, under the Pollock decision—to which I do not assent—it is a tax on property; but if a certain class is selected under the power to levy excise taxes and an excise tax is placed on that class uniformly, so as to make it operate on all in the class uniformly, then it is not a direct tax on property, even though the amount to be paid by the class is measured by its property, as, for instance, in the tobacco cases.

All manufacturers of tobacco are taxed how much? So many cents a pound upon every pound of tobacco that they manufacture. There the tax is fixed on the specific pound of tobacco. But still it is not a property tax in the light of the definition of this tax, because it is a mere means of determining how much the manufacturer of that product shall pay as excise on his business, and that is the difference between them.

Mr. President, I believe I have said all I want to say on that subject, and there is only one other subject upon which I desire to say a few words, and I will do it now, so that I will not have to take the floor again.

Mr. LINDSAY. Will the Senator pardon me, before he leaves this branch of the subject, because it is an interesting one, to make a suggestion? In the State of Kentucky many years ago a system of turnpike improvement was resorted to, the State taking half of the stock in all the turnpike companies. This bill is broad enough to cover every corporation. Now, does the Senator hold that the furnishing to the people of public highways is such an exercise of governmental power as will prohibit the Federal Government from taxing the gross receipts of those turnpike companies?

Mr. TURLEY. No, sir; I hold this: I hold that a State government, having full sovereign power, as much as can appertain to any nation, except in so far as it has delegated a portion of it to the Government of the United States, would have power itself, as an exercise of its sovereign power, to furnish its citizens with highways. If it creates a turnpike corporation and makes it a State institution and collects the revenue from it and owns the stock in it, such corporation might be in the situation of the State bank I spoke of; but if it creates a private corporation to build the turnpike, giving it remuneration in the way of tolls, then it is still a private corporation and is not created as a means of carrying out any element of sovereignty in the State.

I have just read from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States where the distinction is made that franchises granted to railroads by the United States are exempt from State taxation because they are granted in order to carry out the great governmental powers conferred upon the Government of the United States, such as the power to make war and to regulate interstate commerce; and I have shown by the decisions of the same court that railroads created by a State have no such exemption. A railroad is just as much a highway as a turnpike is; but if the railroad is chartered as a private corporation (it is true it has its public duties), certainly it can not be maintained that it is an instrumentality of carrying on the government of a State.

If it could be, you might go further and say street railroads are instrumentalities for carrying on municipal government, because they are just as much highways in cities as steam railroads are highways through the States. The distinction is, as I have said, the creation of the corporation for any of these purposes by the State is an exercise of one of its independent powers, and when created and owned by private individuals the franchise and property of such corporation is just as subject to taxation as any other in the State.

Now let me say this to the Senator from Kentucky. He has brought me back to this subject, and, if I am not taking too long, I want to illustrate it in this way: In the Pollock case the principle is laid down that one government can not tax the properties and instrumentalities of another. That principle applies as between States and the subordinate organizations created by States as much as it does between different States and the States and the United States; that is, in the absence of an express legislative enactment a county or a municipality can not tax the properties and instrumentalities of the State, and neither will the State tax the properties and instrumentalities of the county or municipality.

The State will not tax the county court-house nor the county jail, and the county will not tax any public property owned by the State in the county; but did anybody ever hear that doctrine applied to railroads or corporations? If a railroad created by a State is an instrumentality of State government, a means of carrying out State powers, then the counties and cities would not have power to tax it.

But nobody ever heard of any such distinction, and when you come, in the Pollock case—the income-tax case, to read the instances of what are considered instrumentalities of government, you find not one mention of any of these classes of corporations. They are all confined to property or to bonds representing money borrowed for the purpose of carrying on these various governments, and the United States can not, under that decision, tax a governmental instrumentality of the humblest corporation in a State.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will ask the Senator if this is not true: Does not that decision go to the extent of holding that the incomes resulting from municipal bonds issued and sold to pay for stock in private corporations, such as railroads and canals, could not be taxed?

Mr. TURLEY. Undoubtedly, because the State or the city or the county may invest its public revenue in this class of property, and when so invested it does not cease to be public property. It is the exemption of public property as the one necessary means of carrying on the Government. The State may have money which it thinks wise, for the time being, to invest in that form of property, and the money when so invested remains the property of the State just as much as when it lay in bank after being collected from the taxpayer and before it went into that form of investment.

Mr. LINDSAY. The city sells its bonds and it realizes money, and instead of using that money for strictly municipal purposes, it buys stock in a railroad company which proposes to build a railroad from one city to some other point. When it makes the investment in the railroad, is it making an investment in a private venture or in a governmental enterprise?

Mr. TURLEY. It is making an investment in a governmental enterprise. I will answer the question on that point. It is exactly like the principle in the McCulloch case. There the United States, under the Constitution, used a corporation as a means of carrying out one of its great expressed powers.

Mr. LINDSAY. Can not the State use the corporation as a means of exercising one of its reserve powers?

Mr. TURLEY. Undoubtedly, and when it so clearly appears, then that distinction is made, and it is not liable to taxation by the United States. Take the case of a city. A railroad may desire to come in and place the city in connection with territory that would be very remunerative to its inhabitants and the inhabitants of the whole State. If the city has express power from the State so to do, it may invest some of its public funds in the stock of that railroad company, for a public purpose, a governmental purpose, and it is just like the creation of a bank to carry out the express powers of the United States. It is an express power given a corporation or exercised by the State for the public benefit, but it does not follow from this that every corporation which might be made use of by the State in carrying out some of its reserved powers is stamped with that use simply because the State gives it a charter of incorporation.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me for a moment?

Mr. TURLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Supreme Court of the United States held in the Southern Pacific case and Central Pacific case that where Congress had created a corporation, conferred upon it the franchise to be a corporation, to construct and operate a railroad, the State could not tax the franchise. It also held, in the same case, that where the Southern Pacific, which was a State corporation, had received certain franchises from the United States the State could not tax those franchises.

Mr. TURLEY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SPOONER. The court did not put that upon any ground of interstate commerce or of the exclusive power of Congress, but upon the broad ground laid down by the court in McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, that the power to tax involves the power to destroy, and that if a State might levy a tax, however small, upon a franchise granted by the United States, it might levy a tax that would destroy it. Now, what I want to get at is this. My friend is a State rights man.

Mr. TURLEY. Yes, sir; I am.

Mr. SPOONER. And we all are, within certain limits, and I think I am more of one than I used to be. Where a State grants a franchise to a railroad company—I do not care anything about this tax, so far as I am concerned, except that it be right—creates a corporation upon a presumed adequate consideration, to build and maintain a railroad within the State, conferring upon the railroad company the power of eminent domain—that is, clothing it with a power which, in the last analysis, belongs to the people, to take anything from anybody for a public use and which can not be conferred even upon a person for a public use—can Congress, reasoning from the decision in the Southern Pacific case and the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland, tax the franchise?

I admit it may tax the property, but may it tax the franchise? Is it not, in other words, an instrumentality employed by the State for a public purpose, and is it not true that the power upon the part of the United States to tax it at all involves the power to tax it out of existence, and—I do not say that the power does not exist, but if the power does exist, to be exercised without limit, and it may be exercised without limit if it exists at all—may not the Federal Government dismantle the States so far as corporate instrumentalities are concerned?

Take the turnpike case to which I heard my friend allude a little while ago. A company was authorized to build a turnpike, and the theory is they may take toll which reimburses them for the cost of building the turnpike and the expense of maintaining it. The pending bill imposes a tax of a quarter of 1 per cent upon that corporation. We may levy 50 or 100. Take the case of a corporation to improve the navigability of a stream so as to be susceptible of floating logs to market by reason of dams and all that. The corporation is authorized to make certain charges to reimburse the original expense and the expense of maintenance. If Congress may tax that, may it not destroy it? I have been a good while at it, but my friend will pardon me. What I want to get at is where he would draw the line in this Congressional taxation of State franchises, not property, except as the franchise is property. Within the unlimited right to tax such franchises, can it not destroy?

Mr. TURLEY. I concede to the Senator that the unlimited right to tax carries with it the power to destroy, and I concede further, that wherever the Government of the United States or the government of a State has the power to tax it has the power to impose a tax sufficient in amount to work destruction to the property. That very argument was urged in the McCulloch case.

Mr. SPOONER. And adopted.

Mr. TURLEY. Not adopted. I will answer later about its adoption. On this point the reply was that the power to destroy necessarily accompanied the power to tax, but the safeguard was in the people themselves; that under our system of government taxation and representation went together. When it comes to Congress taxing, then it taxes the whole country as the representative of all the people in the country, and the power that the people have over Congress always controls the power to destroy. If one Congress imposed a tax so unjust as to work destruction, the people could turn it out and send another to correct the evil, and just so in all State taxes.

Now, it is true that in the McCulloch case the court did say that the power to tax was the power to destroy, and that therefore the State could not tax the Bank of the United States; but why? Not because it was simply property. It admitted in that decision that shares of stock in the Bank of the United States could be taxed by the State and that Maryland could enact such laws that no man could live in the State and own stock in the Bank of the United States; but it said it could not tax the corporate property or corporate franchise, because the corporation was necessary and in its very essence the means of carrying out several of the great powers of Government; and if the States were allowed to tax these means used to carry out these great powers, they might be able to destroy the means just as they could destroy the shares of stock in the hands of the stockholder; and the reason why the power to destroy through the power of taxing could not be applied by the State to the Bank of the United States was because the bank was necessarily a means of carrying out a great governmental purpose; and that is the same decision in the Pacific Railroad case. In one of them, I believe, the corporations were chartered by the Government. Chartered why? As a means of carrying out the power to make war, to regulate interstate commerce, and others that I could name.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, if my friend the Senator from Tennessee will allow me, it may be perfectly clear to him, but what is not absolutely clear to me is this: Take a railroad corporation, created by Congress for a governmental purpose, and a railroad corporation created by a State, and the argument is that the State can not tax the governmental purpose employed by the United States, because the power to tax involves the power to destroy; but the Government of the United States can tax without limit this same instrumentality, the same in its nature, the same in its function, employed by the State. That is what I have not quite been able to understand.

Mr. TURLEY. The distinction may be a technical one, but it comes back to this, that the expounders of our Constitution, Chief Justice Marshall and Mr. Webster and the men of that day, in construing the Constitution and expounding it and fixing its meaning and giving it its present effect, held that the Government of the United States had no power to create any corporation at all as an independent act of sovereignty. In other words, while it might create a United States bank to aid the Government in its fiscal operations, it could not create a private bank to carry on business in one State.

Mr. SPOONER. That may be true, but in that case it changed the nature of the instrumentality.

Mr. TURLEY. Undoubtedly; still great lawyers differed from the conclusion of the court and the argument of Mr. Webster. It may be that as an abstract question I would agree with you and say a railroad is a railroad, no matter where it is and no matter whether created by the United States or by a State; that a bank is a bank, no matter where it is, whether created by a State or the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Has the Supreme Court said anything to the contrary?

Mr. TURLEY. The Supreme Court of the United States has exactly said that a State could not tax the United States Bank, but that the United States could tax a State bank of circulation out of existence.

Mr. SPOONER. What the Senator read was arguendo, and I think has been reversed since. But we will let that go. I have always understood the real decision in the case of Veazie Bank vs. Fenno to be that it being a power vested in the Federal Government by the Constitution to furnish the circulating medium, that Congress had the power to tax the State bank circulation out of existence. Of course we all know, as a matter of history, that the purpose of it was to furnish a market primarily for the bonds of the United States, in order to preserve the Government. That does not reach this question, as I understand it.

Mr. TURLEY. I think it does.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think so, because it was based upon a peculiar provision of the Constitution which might be sufficient for that purpose; but the Supreme Court of the United States has held that Congress has power to create corporations to build and operate a railroad in a State as well as in a Territory.

Mr. TURLEY. Through several States.

Mr. SPOONER. It may go through one or several. What is the difference as to the power of taxation, with the Government on the one side and a State on the other, as a Government instrumentality, between a railroad company authorized by the United States to operate through many States and a railroad company created by the State to operate in a State? The State is just as sovereign within its sphere, as I have always understood, although I may be mistaken, as the Government is in its; and is there any good reason for saying the railroad company incorporated by the State, clothed with the power of eminent domain, the right to take your home, no matter how dear and valuable it may be to you because of associations and everything else, at the market value, is not just as much a public instrumentality as one created by the United States? Is it possible to say in the one case that the State can not tax it, because it is a governmental instrumentality and the power to tax involves the power to destroy, and that in the other it is not a State instrumentality, although clothed with the same function, and that the Government may tax it out of existence?

Mr. TURLEY. That comes back as to whether there is any distinction in fact between a railroad chartered by a State and a railroad chartered by the United States. It is a question upon which we may theorize and differ as much as we please, but there is a legal distinction in this question at least. Wherever you find the question discussed—here is the Pacific Railroad case—it says the franchises were granted the company for national purposes and to subserve national ends, and it held they could not be taxed.

Mr. SPOONER. Is a franchise granted by a State for such purpose any the less sacred?

Mr. TURLEY. They say so.

Mr. SPOONER. No; they do not. Where do they say it?

Mr. TURLEY. Right here in the case of the Pacific Railroad against the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. TURLEY. You may say it is dictum. Chief Justice Marshall said so in the McCulloch case.

Mr. SPOONER. He did not say it.

Mr. TURLEY. You may call it dictum. Mr. Webster argued it in that case. You may call it dictum. So in Veazie vs. Fenno, which I read a while ago. That goes on to say, in so many words, that the property of State railroads can be taxed and the instrumentalities of State railroads can be taxed by the Federal Government.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course. So they said in Osborn vs. The Bank, that while the State of Ohio could not tax the franchise, could not tax the operation, it might tax the property.

Mr. TURLEY. Tax the land.

Mr. SPOONER. So I say here it is entirely competent for Congress to tax property. Nobody questions that. The question is, whether Congress can any more tax the franchise, the right to be, of the corporation than the State can tax a Federal corporation?

Mr. TURLEY. I will answer the Senator on that particular point. The proposed law says that all railroad companies, generally including transportation companies, shall pay a special excise tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent on the gross income.

Mr. SPOONER. It does not say that.

Mr. TURLEY. On the gross receipts. In the Michigan Central Company vs. Slack, to which I have already referred, in 100 United States, the law required about the same class of corporations to pay 5 per cent on their profits and interest. That was held to be an excise tax on the net earnings. In the one case we have a tax on the gross earnings, and in the other, sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, a tax on the net earnings, and it was held to be an excise tax.

Mr. SPOONER. Does not my friend see any distinction between a tax on the gross receipts and a tax on the net income or profits?

Mr. TURLEY. I admit that I do not when it comes to a question of power. If it can tax the net income, it can tax the gross income. I never heard that distinction made.

Mr. SPOONER. It seems to me there is a distinction. In the case of the State of Maine the court held that the State might tax the franchise or might refer to the gross earnings for the purpose of getting at the value of the franchise; but that is not this case.

Mr. WHITE. Having some interest in the colloquy, I should like to hear it, and I hope order may be preserved. It is impossible for those who sit here to hear the colloquy now prevailing between Senators on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. TURLEY. One word about the Veazie case, as it has been brought up again. It is said that case was decided on the ground that under the Constitution the United States had the right to furnish currency; but no matter how that is, in order to carry out whatever the purpose was, the United States resorted to the taxing power. Now, certainly it can not have any greater taxing power in that case than in any other case.

Mr. CAFFERY. I may not be correct, but did not the court in the case of Veazie Bank against Fenno say that the power to issue currency was exclusively within the province of the Federal Government, if it chose to exercise it, and therefore it could resort to a tax to destroy the State bank as well as by actual prohibition?

Mr. TURLEY. I assume that is so. I do not recollect. I have not read the decision from end to end lately. But that presents to me this strange proposition, that because it has power to furnish currency, then, in order to carry out that power, it can exercise a taxing power which the Constitution has not given it and which it does not have in any other case. It might have passed a direct law, saying no State bank shall issue money. If, instead of doing that, it chooses to resort to the taxing power, what taxing power could it resort to except the power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution of the United States?

Is there one taxing power to carry out this purpose of issuing currency and another taxing power for raising revenue? I know of no such distinction. The taxing power is the same. It does not change its quality. Congress had two means. It might have passed a law forbidding the issue, but instead of doing that it chose to resort to the general taxing power given it by the Constitution of the United States, and it found that under that taxing power it could do to a State bank what the State could not do to the Bank of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. All this is very interesting to me, but I should like to ask some of the legal lights here to explain where the power to tax oleomargarine comes from that has been exercised by the Government in order, if possible, to destroy the manufacture of it. Upon what legal principle or where in the Constitution does that power come from? I simply want the legal question settled.

Mr. TURLEY. I am not prepared to go into that.

Mr. TILLMAN. They are denying, I believe, the right to tax corporations, and yet they turn in and tax the product.

Mr. TURLEY. I do not propose to go into that subject, because I have already taken more time than I desired to occupy.

I wish to say just a few words on the question of the issuance of United States legal-tender notes—greenbacks. I favor that clause in the bill, as far as my judgment goes, as much as any other provision in it. I think it ought to be enacted. I am not in favor of unlimited paper money, and I believe in the free coinage of silver, as most of us on this side do. I believe in a currency based on coin, silver and gold. But, like a great many things, this is a practical question. I do not think, as conditions now are, you can call that fiat money which a man can take and turn into gold any hour of the day or into silver any hour of the day.

It is practically not fiat money. It is paper money, and under present conditions it is as good as any people could have.

I understand that there are a few principles connected with this subject which all admit; one is that as the business of the country increases and its population increases there ought to be a reasonable and proper increase of the circulating medium, and another that the same number of people doing a certain amount of business at one time greater than they did at another may need more money in the one case than they did in the other.

If the population remains the same and the volume of business and property increases, unless there is some reasonable increase in the volume of the circulating medium, it seems to me that you enter upon an era of falling prices. In the opening of this discussion the vast increase that had been made in the amount of wealth and the accumulation of wealth in this country for the past ten or twelve years was described to us. If that is true, then does any man believe, as the Senator from Texas asked this morning, that this increase of $192,000,000 in our circulating medium is going to injure our financial condition? Does any man believe that it would unsettle our finances?

If this money is issued, it would increase the coin and paper circulation, I believe, about $2.60 per capita. According to the table of circulation by the Treasury Department, this country has had a greater amount in circulation per capita than we would have now if this increase were made without impairing the soundness of its finances. In 1896 we had a circulation amounting to $21.10 per capita. I have not the figures for the next two years. In 1892, the beginning of the period in which it is said we have had so much increase in property, we had $22.37 per capita.

We had in 1892, before the panic commenced, $24.44 per capita. From that time we gradually decreased the circulation until in 1896 it was $21.10 per capita. If this money is issued and added, we would have between $23 and $24 per capita—not as much as we had in 1892 before the panic. We are larger in population by six million or more and, I hope, richer in property.

What evil can come to the Government from the issue of this money? We can see the interest saved year by year. We shall not only save the interest, but, if these figures are correct, it gives back to the people what they need—a little more circulating medium—without running the slightest risk of undue expansion. Certainly if we stood a per capita of $24.44 prior to 1892, we can stand a per capita of between $23 and $24 now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WHITE. I assume that the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana will not be voted on this evening. I suggest that it is not very far from the hour of 5, and unless some Senator is prepared to address the Senate this evening, I think we should discontinue.

Mr. ALLISON. Why not have some understanding that to-morrow at some hour we shall vote upon this series of amendments?

Mr. WHITE. The amendments should be voted on together.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that we have an understanding that to-morrow at some hour we shall vote upon these amendments. There are two or three sections here.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The discussion that has taken place up to this time has been a discussion of the bill generally.

Mr. ALLISON. And a very interesting one.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There has been no delay in the matter of discussing these amendments, and they have not been discussed particularly. I do not think at this time there can be any agreement about any hour to vote upon them. I believe that we can have a vote at an early time, but I think there will be no necessity for fixing a time to vote yet. If there should be any protracted delay or any trouble, I will agree with the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. I only make the suggestion.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if there is an understanding, or whatever it may be called, that the Finance Committee, who have charge of the bill, have since our last adjournment agreed to sundry very important amendments to other sections of the bill? If that be true, and I understand it is, I think it is due to all of us who have not the opportunity of knowing just what is proposed by the amendments of the committee that they should be presented to the Senate and lie on the table until to-morrow morning.

Mr. WHITE. And be printed.

Mr. GORMAN. And be printed. Then the rest of us may know what is intended to be done as to other sections of the bill. As to the particular amendment under discussion, we all understand what it is. I think an explanation of the other amendments agreed upon by the committee is due to the rest of us.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest that as they are evidently important we ought to have them printed to-night. I do not know what they are, and I rose to ask just what the Senator from Maryland has requested, that we might have the amendments printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I can state the amendments in a general way very briefly, and, in fact, in a specific way, if Senators desire it.

Mr. GORMAN. Very well.

Mr. TELLER. And that explanation will go into the RECORD; but let the amendments be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. The first amendment or change proposed by the committee is to strike out "foreign insurance agents," which amendment was passed over when the bill was first read, and to insert "all insurance agents at $12 per annum."

The next amendment, or series of amendments, related to tobacco. They are a series of amendments of very little importance, but two are important. In one the committee recommends that the rate of tax upon tobacco shall be 12 cents instead of 16 cents, as reported by the committee.

Mr. TELLER. Was that unanimous?

Mr. ALLISON. It is unanimous, I may say. I understand there is to be no opposition to it.

Then the tax upon cigars is to be, as far as the committee is concerned, $3.60 instead of $3.50, as reported. That is done chiefly for convenience.

The tax upon cigarettes is $1.50, and there is only one change in the packages, fixing the weight at 1½ ounces. There are some immaterial changes.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the question whether the packages should be 1½ ounces or 1½ ounces was left to be investigated and was in a great measure in the hands of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. That is understood, and even though we may fix it at 1½ ounces it is one of those questions which must be finally disposed of—

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In conference.

Mr. ALLISON. In conference, the House having fixed it at 1½ ounces.

There is a series of amendments, which I believe the committee are unanimous in agreeing to, relating to special taxes, providing that pounds may be used where dollars are used in the bill. It is a matter of great convenience to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to have the special taxes on tobacco assessed by the number of pounds rather than by the number of dollars in value.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. And tobacco dealers.

Mr. ALLISON. All the returns are made in pounds, and the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has no record of the number of dollars. That seems to be a very natural and proper amendment.

The committee went over Schedule B with some care and finally agreed to make only two amendments, but those two amendments very materially change the bill from that originally reported. We propose, on page 53, line 18, after the word "all" and before "preparations," to insert the word "medicinal;" and in line 17, after the word "waters," to insert in parentheses "except natural spring water," so as to exempt natural mineral waters from the bill. The same amendment, that is, the word "medicinal," is to be inserted on page 54, line 4.

These are the amendments the committee have agreed to. Perhaps there are some other little amendments, but I think none others having an important bearing on the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa how about amendment No. 143, page 53, line 13. Is that restored?

Mr. ALLISON. The word "medicines" is restored there.

Mr. GORMAN. Are all three words, "medicines, proprietary articles," restored?

Mr. ALLISON. The words "proprietary articles" will be restored. That amendment is to be offered.

Mr. COCKRELL. What will the provision be?

Mr. ALLISON. It will be as the House proposes it:

Medicines, proprietary articles and preparations.

Mr. GORMAN. Are the words "or trade-mark," which is amendment No. 148, to be stricken out?

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The words "or trade-mark" remain.

Mr. ALLISON. The words "or trade-mark" remain. That amendment, of course, will only apply to medicinal preparations. I understand there is no objection to it. If the Senator will read the word "trade-mark" in connection with the text as we propose to amend it, he will see that all these amendments apply to medicinal preparations and not to preparations such as were described the other day in the debate.

Mr. GORMAN. So that food products would be excluded under the amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. Under the amendment as we propose it all food products would be excluded. I think this embraces all the amendments, and the amendments are few, although the topics are important. The Senator from Arkansas can verify what I say.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think that covers everything, Mr. President. The Senator from Iowa did not state just the action that was taken as to mineral waters.

Mr. ALLISON. I made that statement.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I did not understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. Natural mineral waters are to be free. All mineral waters not medicinal, of course, would be free under the phraseology inserted.

Mr. WHITE. To mention a subject very familiar probably to the people at large, soda water, for instance, would not be taxed.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator withhold his motion for a moment? I had addressed the Chair before the Senator, but the Chair did not hear me. I desire to address the Senate just a moment.

Mr. CARTER. I withdraw the motion at the request of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to say a word, because the subject is now fresh before the Senate, and for the purpose of entering my entire dissent to the doctrine proclaimed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY], in so far as the power of taxation is concerned. I do it because this is the time to enter my dissent to that doctrine and not later in the session of the Senate. The Senator from Tennessee said he did not doubt—I think that was his language—the power to tax the franchise and the property of a corporation and at the same time to tax the certificates of stock held in that corporation.

Mr. TURLEY rose.

Mr. ALLEN. I may be entirely wrong. It would be strange if I were not in some things.

Mr. TURLEY. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. TURLEY. What I meant is that the tax on the certificate of stock would be a tax on it in the hands of the shareholder. In other words, the tax would be against the holder of the certificate. That is what I meant.

Mr. ALLEN. That is exactly as I understood the Senator, that a tax can be imposed upon the property of the corporation to its full cash value, and at the same time a like tax can be imposed upon the certificate of stock in the hands of the shareholder.

Mr. President, that is not the law in the United States, or in any State, so far as I am familiar with the laws of the States on the subject of taxation. Taxation, according to the laws of the United States, must be equal upon all property as nearly as it can be made equal, not in an ideal, but in a practical sense. The certificate is simply the evidence that the holder has an interest in the property of the corporation; it is an evidence of his title. If the property covered by that certificate is taxed to its full value, there is no court of equity in the United States that would not enjoin a tax imposed upon the certificate itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Montana withhold his motion for one moment and take the chair?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

STEAMSHIP ZEALANDIA.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I wish to report a bill from the Committee on Commerce. I dislike exceedingly to admit to American registry foreign-built ships; but the War Department is levying blackmail, and I recognize the necessity of sending men to Manila. The Government has chartered the ship Zealandia for that purpose, and I have received a telegram asking that a commission may be granted at once, so that the ship can be prepared to sail. Therefore I report favorably and ask the present consideration of the bill I send to the desk.

The bill (S. 4645) to provide an American register for the steamship Zealandia was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARTER in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. What is this vessel?

Mr. FRYE. It was an English ship.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What line is it in?

Mr. PERKINS. I beg to correct the Senator from Maine. The vessel is now under the Hawaiian flag.

Mr. FRYE. She is an iron steamship.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What is her register?

Mr. FRYE. Two thousand seven hundred and thirty tons.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What is the necessity for this legislation?

Mr. FRYE. The War Department send me a telegram stating that they have chartered it, and that it is absolutely necessary for them to do so for the purpose of sending troops to Manila.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Can the Senator tell me who owns the vessel?

Mr. PERKINS. The Oceanic Steamship Company.

Mr. FRYE. Yes; the Oceanic Steamship Company, of San Francisco.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood the Senator from Maine to say that the War Department was levying blackmail. He meant that the owners of this vessel are levying blackmail on the War Department?

Mr. FRYE. Very likely.

Mr. TILLMAN. I just wanted to get at what you did say and what you meant.

Mr. FRYE. I meant that the War Department were chartering ships in advance to carry men to Manila, and that then they call upon Congress to give an American register to that ship so that they can be permitted to employ it. The term "blackmail" was a joke to a large extent.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator please tell us what rates are being paid by the Government to the owners of these vessels on the Pacific?

Mr. FRYE. Of course, I did not mean what the Senator intimates, as he well understands.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator must be taken seriously, because he never jokes.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator must be an Englishman, if he can not see it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator must be taken seriously, for I have never known him to joke.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamship Zealandia, owned by the Oceanic Steamship Company of San Francisco, Cal., to be registered as a vessel of the United States.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know the necessity for giving this vessel an American register. That the War Department says so I do not think is a sufficient reason.

Mr. FRYE. I telegraphed to the War Department to-day and informed them that this ship was on the Hawaiian register, and that as the Hawaiian Islands had proclaimed no neutrality the Department had an undoubted right to charter the vessel. They telegraphed back that they understood that to be so, but that the vessel was an absolute necessity, and they could not make the charter without the registry.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In other words, giving an American register is a part of the consideration. Is that the point?

Mr. FRYE. It seems to be.

Mr. CHANDLER. Undoubtedly that is the case.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL, Mr. STEWART, Mr. TELLER, and others. Oh, no!

Mr. PETTIGREW. The next thing will be that the whole line will follow.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it come. We will meet the question then.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Everything under the Occidental and Oriental Line, and so on.

Mr. SPOONER. Never mind that now.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If this is a sufficient reason, then that will be a sufficient reason to bring the whole line to an American registry.

Mr. FRYE. I should think the Senator from South Dakota could yield on this proposition if the chairman of the Committee on Commerce could. It comes hard enough for me.

Mr. WHITE. It seems to me that now nothing can be done to establish a precedent to bind the Senate in a matter of this kind hereafter. We have to vote for a great many matters in war exigencies which ordinarily would not meet with our approval. I think, perhaps, that ought to be sufficient to explain our votes hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. At the earnest solicitation of my friends and for the reason it is the only manifestation of haste on the part of the Administration that we have had since the war began, I will withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3686) to encourage American shipbuilding, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

QUARTERMASTER'S SUPPLIES, ETC.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move, for the purpose of correcting a clerical error, that the Senate request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the conference report upon the bill (H. R.

10121) to suspend the operation of certain provisions of law relating to the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection, and that is the order.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 24, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, May 23, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read, corrected, and approved.

APPOINTMENT OF ARMY OFFICERS TO VOLUNTEER POSITIONS.

Mr. HULL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4621.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 4621) to amend sections 10 and 13 of an act entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," approved April 22, 1898.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," approved April 22, 1898, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following, to wit: "And provided, That officers of the Regular Army shall be eligible for such staff appointments, and shall not be held to vacate their offices in the Regular Army by accepting the same, but shall be entitled to receive only the pay and allowances of their staff rank."

SEC. 2. That section 13 of said act is amended so as to read as follows:

"That the governor of any State or Territory may, with the consent of the President, appoint officers of the Regular Army in the grades of field officers in organizations of the Volunteer Army, and the President may appoint officers of the Regular Army in the grade of field officers in organizations of the Volunteer Army raised in the District of Columbia and the Indian Territory, and in the regiments possessing special qualifications, provided for in section 6 of an act of Congress approved April 22, 1898, and in section 2 of the act of Congress approved May 11, 1898; and officers thus appointed shall be entitled to retain their rank in the Regular Army: Provided, That not more than one officer of the Regular Army shall hold a commission in any one regiment of the Volunteer Army at the same time: And provided further, That officers so appointed shall be entitled to receive only the pay and allowances of their rank in the volunteer organization."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that in the volunteer act—

The SPEAKER. The question is on granting unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HULL. I ask consent to make a brief statement.

Mr. DOCKERY. We should like to hear some explanation of the bill.

Mr. COX. I am not going to object to granting unanimous consent; but I desire a few minutes to explain what this bill does as compared with the volunteer bill.

Mr. HULL. In the volunteer act which was recently passed we provided in express terms that brigadier-generals appointed from the Regular Army should retain their rank in the Regular Army; and we also provided in express terms that Regular Army officers commissioned by the governors of States with the consent of the President to serve in volunteer regiments should retain their rank. But in the section with reference to the staff it was provided that the President might appoint officers of the volunteer force from civil life, or might assign to such positions officers of the Regular Army. The word "assign" was used. Now, the President has commissioned some of these Regular Army officers for staff duty.

For instance, Captain Black, whom many gentlemen know as one of the District Commissioners, and who is now a major in the Regular Army, has been commissioned as lieutenant-colonel on a corps commander's staff as an engineer. Now, if he accepts the position of lieutenant-colonel in the Volunteer Army, it is held by the law officers of the Treasury Department and also by the War Department that he will vacate his position in the Regular Army because there is a provision of law that where an officer receives $2,500 a year or more he can not accept any other office without vacating the one previously held.

The War Department has sent in a report on this subject which is quite full, but as this is District day, I do not care to take time in having the whole paper read. That is all there is in the first section of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. In the case referred to—that of Captain Black, who is now a major in the Regular Army—should he accept the appointment of lieutenant-colonel in the volunteers, he will, as I understand this bill, draw the pay of a lieutenant-colonel.

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. What becomes, then, of his position as major in the Regular Army during the time he is filling the position of lieutenant-colonel of volunteers?

Mr. HULL. He does not draw the pay of a major while holding this position in the volunteers; but at the conclusion of hostilities he would have the same rank in the Regular Army that he would have had if he had not accepted this position.

Mr. DOCKERY. But will the law operate to assign some one else to the position of major which he vacates?

Mr. HULL. Not at all. There is no vacancy in Regular Army by such appointment.

Mr. DOCKERY. So that this bill will not operate to increase the number of officers?

Mr. HULL. Not at all. The difficulty which the President meets in regard to making these assignments, without some such provision as this bill contains, is this: Captain Black, for instance, holding the rank of captain, could only be assigned to a captaincy; he would go on a brigadier-general's staff with the rank of captain; and a man appointed from civil life as a lieutenant-colonel of volunteers would outrank him; so that Captain Black, an experienced and accomplished officer, would be subject to the orders of a man appointed from civil life who might not know anything about army engineering. The purpose is to get the best obtainable talent for this grade of engineers.

Mr. DOCKERY. I quite agree that in this case of Major Black he is entitled to the pay of a lieutenant-colonel during the time he may fill that office in the Volunteer Army; but the question occurred to me, Does not the law require some one else to come in and take the office of major which he vacates?

Mr. HULL. Not at all. It makes no additional office in the Regular Army. There must be a vacancy before an appointment can be made. And the volunteer bill itself provides that whenever the war closes these assignments must terminate.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, it ought to be clear. Of course we have not had time to look at the bill. For one I should not consent to the consideration of the measure if it in effect increased the number of officers—

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, it absolutely does not. I assure the gentleman of that.

Mr. DOCKERY. I accept the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HULL. It absolutely gives no power to increase the Regular Army a single man. It simply protects these staff officers that we thought we had protected before, but we failed to put that proviso in that section.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, will the gentleman explain the next section?

Mr. HULL. We left out the words in section 13 of the volunteer act, "the District of Columbia and the Indian Territory." We put those words in two other sections of the bill, and they hold that unless they are put in here no Regular Army officer is eligible from those districts for appointment in volunteer regiments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if his colleagues on the committee on this side of the House all agree with him in his construction?

Mr. HULL. I think every colleague on that side except the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] voted in favor of taking this from the Speaker's table.

Mr. COX. I did not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to hear from the gentleman from Tennessee before unanimous consent is given.

Mr. HAY. I assume that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] will control the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. HULL. I want to say to the House that the whole matter of staff appointments is held up until the passage of this bill, and I am very urgently requested to ask the House to pass upon it at once. If it had not been for our adjournment over, I should have tried to secure the passage of the bill last week.

Mr. HANDY. Has this bill been before the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. HULL. Yes, and been considered fully. The gentleman from Tennessee was the only one who was opposed to it, I think.

Mr. GAINES. I will state to the gentleman that I want to pass all necessary war legislation, but I am not going to "agree" to take up anything unless we understand what we "take up." If the gentleman will give time for some one to explain the bill, I shall not object.

Mr. HULL. If objections are to be made at this time, as this is District day, I shall have to withdraw the bill.

Mr. GAINES. I think District matters can give way to matters relating to the Union, and I do not propose to allow things to be shunted through here without an opportunity being given to understand them.

Mr. COX. Do I understand that I am not to have any time to state the position I occupy in regard to this bill? If that is the understanding, I will put an end to it as quickly as I can.

Mr. HAY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] that unanimous consent be given for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HULL. That is what I have asked.

Mr. HAY. And that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] have as much time as is necessary for him to explain his position.

Mr. HULL. I ask unanimous consent, in view of the fact—

Mr. COX. Let me understand the gentleman—

Mr. HULL. Under my agreement with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BARCOCK], chairman of the District Committee, I withdraw my request for unanimous consent, if it is to take time.

The SPEAKER. The bill may be taken up later.

Mr. HULL. I should like unanimous consent to take one bill from the Speaker's table, for the purpose of fixing the pay of troops from the time of their enrollment to the date of their muster.

Mr. COX. That is all right.

Mr. HULL. It is Senate bill 4607.

Mr. BARLOW. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires first to recognize the gentleman from California [Mr. BARLOW].

GRANT OF CERTAIN LANDS TO THE CITY OF SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

Mr. BARLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9554) granting certain lands to the city of Santa Barbara, Cal.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I understand this bill cedes some 8,000 acres of land to the city of Santa Barbara for the purpose of city water-works.

Mr. BARLOW. Yes; that is, it gives them the right to purchase the land at the Government price of $1.25 an acre.

Mr. PAYNE. It gives them the right to do what?

Mr. BARLOW. It gives them the right to purchase the land at the Government price of $1.25 an acre.

Mr. PAYNE. They are to give the Government price for it?

Mr. BARLOW. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I think I shall have to object to bringing this up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] objects.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill to which I referred.

PAYMENT OF VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill (S. 4607) providing for the payment and maintenance of volunteers during the interval between their enrollment and muster into the United States service, and for other purposes, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the pay and allowance of such of the volunteers as are received into the service of the United States under the act of Congress approved April 23, 1898, and the acts supplemental thereto, shall be deemed to commence from the day on which they joined for duty and are enrolled at the battalion, regimental, or State rendezvous: Provided, That troops about to embark for service in the Philippine Islands may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be paid one month's wages in advance prior to embarkation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HULL. I wish to say to the House that at the end of the District business I shall try to get up one or two bills that are deemed of special importance.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] has a bridge bill.

SENATE RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 40—

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER, QUINDARO, KANS.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9075) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Quindaro, Kans., by the Kansas City, Northeastern and Gulf Railway Company.

The bill was read. It provides that the Kansas City, Northeastern and Gulf Railway Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of Kansas, be, and the same is hereby, authorized and empowered to erect, construct, and maintain a bridge over and across the Missouri River for the passage and crossing of railroad cars and engines and such other material and things as may be used in the management, construction, or operation of a railroad, giving and granting to said railway company the power and authority to erect, establish, construct, and maintain in connection with such railway bridge a wagon and foot-passenger bridge, or either or both of them.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to ask if this bill has received the consideration of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. PETERS. Yes; it was unanimously reported by that Committee.

Mr. PAYNE. I notice there is an amendment to the bill. Does that strike out all the provisions for a drawbridge? The bill gives the company the option of building a drawbridge or a bridge which shall leave 50 feet clear between high-water mark and the bridge. I notice there is an amendment striking out some of the provisions about the drawbridge.

Mr. PETERS. The amendment was placed there at the request of the Attorney-General, to comply with some regulations of interstate commerce.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the amendment still leave a provision for a drawbridge?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the amendment require the drawbridge to leave 50 feet clear between high-water mark and the bridge?

Mr. PETERS. I so understand it.

Mr. PAYNE. Is not the gentleman sure about that?

Mr. PETERS. No, sir; I am not.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I should like to examine it first, because, Mr. Speaker, some time or other we may have some commerce on this river and may need it. We are spending a great deal of money in order to make it a navigable stream, and if we should ever get one we do not want it obstructed by bridges which are not in the proper form.

Mr. PETERS. I think the gentleman will find that the bridge must conform to all the necessary requirements.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the point which the gentleman from New York makes?

Mr. PETERS. He wants to know whether under the amendment the Attorney-General ordered the drawbridge to be 50 feet in the clear. The Attorney-General took the bill and had it conform to all the laws and regulations which are usual in these bills.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman had better let the bill go over.

Mr. PETERS. This is a unanimous report.

Mr. DOCKERY. There is a drawbridge now on the Missouri River at Kansas City, and, as I understand, this is a bill to authorize the construction of another bridge at Quindaro at a point above or below the other high bridge, and a drawbridge. Is that it?

Mr. PETERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. That was in the bill, but the committee offer an amendment, and I can not find out from the gentleman what limitation the amendment makes in the bill.

Mr. PETERS. The amendment was suggested by the Attorney-General, as the report will show, and they made it conform to his suggestion.

Mr. BENNETT. I will say to the gentleman, quoting from the bill, or the amendment of the committee:

Shall be a high bridge with unbroken and continuous spans, the lowest point of superstructure of which shall have an elevation of at least 50 feet above the high-water grade for bridges as established by the Missouri River Commission.

Mr. PAYNE. Is that the amendment?

Mr. BENNETT. That is the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Speaker, it seems this provides for a high bridge. The gentleman from Kansas, of course, knows that the Government has spent a great many million dollars improving the navigation of the Missouri River; and possibly in the future some one may attempt to navigate it; and if so, I want to have 50 feet clear, so that they can get under this bridge.

Mr. PETERS. The amendment provides for your kind of a bridge.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to my friend, to those of us who know something of the Missouri River, we know that there have been a great many millions spent upon it, and ten times as much more may be spent, and then a hundred millions may be spent by mandamus to get commerce upon that river, and it would not come.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PETERS. This does not interfere with commerce.

Mr. PAYNE. I want the provisions for commerce to be consistent, if there is to be any navigation.

Mr. SIMPSON. This provides for commerce across the river, and not up and down the river.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PETERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

BUILDING LINES ON CERTAIN STREETS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I present for consideration the bill (H. R. 10106) to provide for the establishment of building lines on certain streets in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to establish building lines on streets or parts of streets less than 50 feet wide in the District of Columbia, upon the presentation to them of a plat of the street or a portion of the street upon which such action is desired, showing the lots and the names of the record owners thereof, and accompanied by a petition of the owners of one-half of the real estate shown on said plat requesting that building lines be established, or when said Commissioners shall certify that public health, comfort, or convenience requires that such building lines be established.

Sec. 2. That upon the filing of such plat and petition in the office of said Commissioners, or when said Commissioners shall certify that public health, comfort, or convenience requires that such building lines be established, said Commissioners shall make application in writing to the United States marshal for the District of Columbia to summon and impanel a jury of twelve citizens who have no interest in the real estate mentioned in the petition (and it is hereby made his duty to summon and impanel the same in all such cases upon application in writing of said Commissioners), who, after first taking and subscribing an oath in writing to discharge the duties imposed upon them by the provisions of this act justly and impartially, shall proceed to ascertain and appraise the damages which may accrue to the real estate of any person or persons by the establishment of said building lines, which shall be the value of the land at the time of the taking, and the said jury shall make and return their verdict in triplicate, one original to be filed in the office of the said Commissioners, one in the office of the recorder of deeds of said District, and one in the office of the surveyor of the said District. And the damages awarded by said jury shall be payable out of any funds available for opening, widening, and extending alleys, under the act approved March 3, 1893, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for prior years, and for other purposes."

SEC. 3. That the said jury shall apportion an amount equal to the amount of said damages, ascertained and appraised as aforesaid, including the fees of the marshal for his services and $50 for the services of said jury, according as each lot or parcel of land in any square may be benefited by the establishment of building lines, and they shall make return of such apportionment to said Commissioners, in which they shall designate each lot or part of lot of land so benefited and the amount so apportioned to each, respectively; and in case of failure to pay the amount so apportioned, it shall be the duty of the collector of taxes to levy a tax upon each lot or part of lot of land in accordance with such apportionment, and to collect the same as other taxes on real estate are collected; and said assessments shall bear interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum until paid.

SEC. 4. That the said marshal shall give or cause to be given notice of the time and place of meeting of said jurors, for the purposes aforesaid, to each proprietor of land in the square where the building line is proposed to be established, as provided in section 6 of the act of Congress approved July 22, 1892, entitled "An act to provide for the opening of alleys in the District of Columbia."

SEC. 5. That the said Commissioners, whenever they deem it desirable in the interest of economy, may permit buildings existing at the time said building lines are established, and which project beyond said lines, to remain until such time as the owners of said buildings desire to reconstruct or substantially alter the said buildings: Provided, That the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, providing for certain projections upon street parkings, shall apply to all parkings established under this act, and the control of said parkings otherwise shall be vested in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who are hereby authorized to make and enforce all reasonable and necessary regulations for their care and preservation.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to establish building lines or to bring improvements on streets less than 90 feet in width to a line; or, in other words, to establish how much parking shall be between the streetline and the building line. The bill simply provides for a method of accomplishing this purpose, and provides, where one-half of the property holders on a street or block desire to improve and have this building line established, a method by which it can be done by petition to the Commissioners. That is practically all there is in the measure.

Mr. DOCKERY. Has it been submitted to the Commissioners and had their approval?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is a bill of the Commissioners. It was submitted by them and approved by everybody. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ABANDONED STREET RAILWAY TRACKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask present consideration of the bill (S. 914) to compel street railway companies in the District of Columbia to remove abandoned tracks, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter whenever the track or tracks or any part thereof of any street railway company in the District of Columbia shall not have been operated for railway purposes for a period of three months, the Commissioners of said District, in their discretion, may thereupon notify such company to remove said unused tracks and to place the street in good condition; and if such company shall neglect or refuse to remove said tracks and place the street in good condition within sixty days after such notice, the president of said company shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be liable to a fine of $10 for each and every day during which said tracks are permitted to remain upon the street or streets or said roadway shall remain out of repair, which fine shall be recovered in the police court of said District, in the name of said District, as other fines and penalties are now recovered in said court.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "been," insert the word "regularly;" and after the word "purposes" add the words "upon a schedule approved by the Commissioners;" so that the same will read: "shall not have been regularly operated for railway purposes upon a schedule approved by the Commissioners."

Page 1, line 11, strike out the word "president" and insert in lieu thereof the word "directors."

Also add the following:

"SEC. 2. That on and after one year from the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any street railway company, operating its system or parts of its system over lines owned and operated by another street railway company in the city of Washington, to continue such operation or to enter into reciprocal trackage relations with any other company, as provided for under existing law, unless its motive power for the propulsion of its cars shall be the same as that of the company whose tracks are used or to be used. For every violation of this act the company violating it shall be subject to a fine of $10, to be collected and applied in the same manner as is provided by existing laws in respect of other lines in the District of Columbia."

"SEC. 3. That all street railway companies within the District of Columbia now operating their systems or parts of their systems in the city of Washington by use of the tracks of one or more of such companies, under a reciprocal trackage agreement, as provided for under existing law, which shall be compelled by reason of the passage of this act to discontinue the use of the tracks of another company, shall issue free transfers to their patrons from one system to the other at such junctions of their respective lines as may be provided for by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

"SEC. 4. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. RIDGELY. I would like to ask the gentleman if the street railways of the city are asking for this legislation?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman asks me if any street railway companies are asking for this legislation. I say no, they are not; but the people and the District Commissioners are. The primary purpose of the bill is to compel the street railway companies to take up abandoned tracks and to put the street upon which those tracks were laid in repair after they have been taken up. After the tracks have not been regularly operated for railroad purposes for a period of three months, the District Commissioners may notify the company to remove such unused tracks and to place the street in good repair and in good condition, and if the company neglect or refuse to remove the tracks within sixty days after such notice, the directors of the company shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and are liable to a fine of $10 for each day they shall allow the tracks to remain after having received the notice.

Mr. GAINES. Must the street railroad companies remove the tracks?

Mr. BABCOCK. In other words—

Mr. RIDGELY. I should like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will explain the bill.

Mr. RIDGELY. There is something in the bill about transfer tickets and transferring passengers from one road to another, I believe?

Mr. BABCOCK. This is a Senate bill, and the House amended it by adding a provision that after one year from the date of the passage of this bill no company can use another company's tracks except by the same motive power. Years ago the lines here were horse-car lines and the motive power alike. Now, we have a condition of having the finest rapid-transit lines in the world which are delayed and the passengers put to a serious inconvenience by horse cars. This provides that within one year these lines using horse cars must, if they use these tracks, use the same motive propulsion. It provides further that whenever they are taken the companies must issue free transfers to the passengers. There will be no inconvenience to passengers except for transfer. Now, Mr. Speaker I ask for a vote on the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONTROL OF WHARF PROPERTY AND PUBLIC PLACES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10294) relative to the control of wharf property and certain public places in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have the exclusive charge and control of all wharf property belonging to the United States or to the District of Columbia within said District, including all the wharves, piers, bulkheads, and structures thereon and waters adjacent thereto within the pier lines, and all slips, basins, docks, water fronts, land under water, and structures thereon, and the appurtenances, easements, uses, reversions, and rights belonging thereto, which are now owned or possessed by the United States or the District of Columbia, or to which they or either of them is or may become entitled, or which they or either of them may acquire under the provisions hereof or otherwise; and said Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have exclusive charge and control of the repairing, building, rebuilding, maintaining, altering, strengthening, leasing, and protecting said property and every part thereof, and all the cleaning, dredging, and deepening necessary in and about the same within the pier lines. SEC. 2. That said Commissioners are hereby authorized and empowered to make all needful rules and regulations for the government and proper care of all the property placed in their charge and under their control by the provisions of section 1 of this act and to annex such reasonable penalties to said rules and regulations as will secure their enforcement; and also to make and enforce rules and regulations in regard to building and repairing wharves, the rental thereof, and the rate of wharfage.

But the said Commissioners shall have authority to enter upon any of the spaces or reservations named above for the purpose of widening the roadway of any street or avenue adjacent thereto, or to establish sidewalks along the same, whenever in their judgment the public necessity or convenience requires it, in order to establish such roadways or sidewalks, or both, as may be required for the public needs, or such as will correspond in width and direction with the roadway or sidewalk of the street or avenue beyond the reservation; and whenever in the judgment of said Commissioners it may become necessary or desirable to set aside any portion of the space between building lines in the streets or avenues of the District of Columbia for a park or reservation, the control of the same, after having been set aside by said Commissioners as a park or reservation, shall be vested in the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, who shall also have control of any land acquired for park purposes under the act approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities." Provided further, That this act shall not affect in any manner the provision in the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for prior years, and for other purposes," that no permits for projections beyond the building line on the streets and avenues of the city of Washington shall be granted except upon special application and with the concurrence of all of said Commissioners and the approval of the Secretary of War; and the operation of said provision is hereby extended to the entire District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. That said Commissioners are hereby authorized to make all needful rules and regulations for the government and proper care of all the public spaces within the lines of highways, by the third section of this act placed in their charge and under their control, and to annex to such rules and regulations such reasonable penalties as will secure their enforcement.

SEC. 5. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

During the reading of the bill the following occurred:

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill giving the numbers of the blocks and trapezoids may be omitted up as far as line 4, page 21, as it is merely repetition.

Mr. CANNON. I think, Mr. Speaker, the bill ought to be read.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the Clerk will proceed.

After the reading of the bill was completed,

Mr. BABCOCK. I now yield, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. CANNON rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish to say something about the bill?

Mr. CANNON. I will. I want to make a few observations before consideration is commenced. I do not know how important a bill this is, but it seems to me it is so far-reaching in its provisions and is that kind of a bill that it ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is it a matter which the rule requires to be considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BABCOCK. The bill makes no appropriation; neither does it divert public property.

Mr. CANNON. No; but it gives jurisdiction of all wharf property that belongs to the United States to the Commissioners of the District. Everything under the highway act, if I recollect, was to be paid for out of the revenues of the District, and by this provisional legislation it would throw everything on the revenue of the Treasury. There is a transfer back and forth of jurisdiction, an exclusive giving of the rent as well as the care of United States property to the District Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

It seems to me, without knowing anything about it further than from the reading of the bill, that it does affect the property of the United States.

Mr. KING. Only as to its management and control.

Mr. BABCOCK. It only designates what officers shall control it.

Mr. CANNON. As to its revenues?

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. KING. The gentleman from Illinois is partially correct. It does give to the District Commissioners the right to prescribe proper police regulations and incidentally exercise such control as will enable them to collect proper rent for the use of the wharf by private persons who are now occupying the same and refusing to pay rent because there is no person, as claimed by them, having jurisdiction to control the property.

The SPEAKER. Does it authorize them to rent the property?

Mr. KING. Yes; it says the District Commissioners shall establish reasonable rules and regulations for the control of the wharfage, and also authorizes them to collect rents for the use of the property.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The matter is in a very chaotic condition at this time, and there ought to be some bill like this passed to determine the authority of who shall manage and control these wharf rights on the river.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but it seems to me, unless there is a large latitude offered for consideration in the House, that it is peculiarly a bill that ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. Speaking for myself, as a member of the committee, I have no objection to a proper latitude in the consideration of the measure. As I understand it, there is no objection by the authorities in the War or Navy Department to the control, so far as the renting of it and the exercise of adequate police protection, being vested in the District Commissioners.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that this bill simply defines who the Government officers are that shall rent this property and have immediate charge of it. Under the present chaotic condition no one has control of it. This bill defines the right and places it in charge of the Commissioners.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me this would determine the matter: If it is under the engineer officers and the title is in the United States, whatever rents were collected would go into the United States Treasury.

Mr. BABCOCK. They do now.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if the revenues of this property be placed under the control of the District Commissioners, they are District revenues, the same as taxes collected.

Mr. BABCOCK. The money all goes into the Treasury of the United States as a specific income.

The SPEAKER. The rule which, as the Chair understands, the gentleman from Illinois relies upon provides that—

All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, or referring any claim to the Court of Claims, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole.

Now, under which head does the gentleman from Illinois claim that this bill should receive its consideration in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CANNON. I think that it absolutely takes property of the United States—the rentals of public property.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman from Illinois designate the portion of the rule upon which he predicates the statement that the bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CANNON. I think the bill takes real estate belonging to the United States, the rents and profits of which go into the Treasury, and transfers that property to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, so that those rents and profits will become a part of the District revenue the same as revenues from District taxation. That seems to me the effect of the bill. I will ask my friend whether it is not?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think that is the effect of the bill. I concede that if such were the effect, it would make a difference in the disposition of the revenues to that extent and would bring the bill within the rule as read by the Speaker requiring that bills of a certain class be first considered in Committee of the Whole. I do not think, however, that the bill does what the gentleman from Illinois indicates. I do not think it diverts the revenues at all from the course they now take under the law.

I will say, however, to the gentleman that if he will consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, the amplest opportunity will be given for debate and amendment. There is no disposition on the part of the committee to rush the bill through.

Mr. CANNON. I have no disposition to obstruct its consideration.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I know the gentleman has none. It is necessary that the bill should be passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee proposes that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. What time for general debate is desired?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman from Utah will be allowed to make an explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah is recognized.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that any explanation which might be made would be as clear and concise as the letter which has been submitted by the president of the Board of Commissioners in answer to a communication submitted to him by Hon. JAMES McMILLAN, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia in the United States Senate. Accordingly, I send this letter to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, May 6, 1898.

SENATOR: In compliance with your letter of April 23, the Commissioners have the honor to submit herewith the draft of a bill relative to the control of wharf property and certain public spaces in the District of Columbia.

The laws governing the control of wharf property in the District of Columbia are somewhat obscure, so that it is uncertain whether the control of such property is vested in the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army or in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. As a matter of fact it is claimed by both, and the Commissioners are and have been for some years in receipt of rentals for wharf property leased by them from time to time. At the same time the validity of their action is so uncertain that they have not been able in all cases to collect the rentals accruing under such leases. It seems quite essential, therefore, that the laws governing the matter should be made positive and clear.

The first and second sections of the inclosed bill relate to the control of wharf property, and are so drawn that the control of this property is vested either in the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army or in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as Congress in its wisdom may decide. They are modeled after the present wharf laws of the city of New York.

The remaining sections of the bill relate to the various parks and reservations in the District. A close examination of these parks shows that they consist of three classes, namely:

(1) Original "appropriations."

(2) Land acquired by purchase and set aside for park purposes.

(3) Street spaces at the intersection of streets and avenues.

With the first two classes the bill has nothing to do, except as to such portions of them as may lie outside of building lines and may be needed for street purposes.

It is uncertain in whom the jurisdiction over the third class is vested, as the legislation on the subject is obscure and contradictory. Under section 225 of the Revised Statutes Relating to the District of Columbia, the District authorities have laid out in many of the street spaces circles and other reservations of various forms where the space was not needed for roadways or sidewalks. By agreement between the District authorities and the Chief of Engineers, some of these have been placed under the control of the latter-named officer. At the same time, there are a number of such spaces within the District of Columbia which the Chief of Engineers has declined to accept for park purposes. These spaces occur sometimes as triangles, trapezoids, or circles, surrounded by roadways, and at other times in the form of irregular spaces formed by the parking at the intersections of streets and avenues.

It is very necessary that the laws concerning the control of such spaces should be positive and clear, more especially since upon such legislation depends the distribution of assessments for special improvements, such as sidewalks, sewers, water mains, and the expenditure of the appropriation for sidewalks around public reservations.

In Appendix C C C of the report of the Chief of Engineers for the year 1894 there appears a list of the various spaces claimed by the Chief of Engineers as reservations and public spaces under his charge, together with a map showing their location. This list contains all of the parks and reservations in the three classes mentioned above.

The list of reservations contained in the proposed bill embraces, so far as the information of the Commissioners can determine, all of the spaces of the third class which should at present be placed in charge of the Chief of Engineers. The spaces mentioned in the list contained in Appendix C C C, which are omitted from the bill, are confined to the first and second classes mentioned, and to other spaces which should not now be under the charge of the Chief of Engineers, either because they are too small for park purposes or are entirely covered by sidewalks or roadways, or because they can not be properly defined at present on account of the sidewalk, roadway, and parking lines not being laid out, due to the lack of improvement of the streets in which they lie. The only exception to the above is the case of one reservation—marked No. 125 in the list printed in Appendix C C C, before mentioned—on which a schoolhouse has been located for many years.

A list of the omitted so-called parks, with the reasons for their omission from the draft of the bill, is appended hereto.

The legislation asked for, included in the bill, is believed to be very greatly needed, and early and favorable action by the committee is respectfully and earnestly requested.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOHN W. ROSS,

President Board of Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. JAMES McMILLAN,

Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,

United States Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, since this bill was reported, which commits to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia exclusive control of the wharfage of the District, the War Department has submitted a bill relating to the same subject, in which that Department asks that all the wharfage, "except 500 linear feet of the shore line in the flushing reservoir at the foot of Seventeenth street west, and west from the western curb of said street, including a levee 100 feet wide," shall be committed to the jurisdiction and control of the District Commissioners.

The War Department is willing, as indicated in the bill submitted by it, that this jurisdiction shall be assumed and exercised by the District Commissioners, but asks that the portion of the wharf, if it may be so denominated, which lies opposite the Arsenal shall be left under the jurisdiction and control of the Chief of Engineers. There is some question whether or not the bill as it has been reported would include the Arsenal grounds. I am inclined to think, without having investigated the subject fully, that the Arsenal grounds are so distinct and so segregated from the rest of the wharfage that this bill would not commit to the jurisdiction of the District any of the Arsenal grounds or the wharfage contiguous to the same. As already stated, the War Department and the officials of the Government desire to commit, and in the bill which they have carefully prepared this is clearly expressed, to the District Commissioners the undisputed control of all the wharfage.

Now, if there should be some uncertainty respecting the wharfage at the Arsenal, I do not think there will be any disposition on the part of the Commissioners to take from the War Department the jurisdiction and control of that wharfage; and the members of the House committee are perfectly willing that an amendment to remove that uncertainty may be added, so as to restrict the jurisdiction of the Commissioners to all the wharfage outside of that specifically enumerated in the bill which has just been submitted to us by Mr. Bingham, in charge of Public Buildings and Grounds.

There can be no question but what there should be some legislation touching this subject. I have been informed by some of the members of the committee who have recently made an investigation that numerous persons are occupying a portion of this wharf, which is valuable to them, and that they decline to pay rental, and the law is so indefinite that adequate steps have not been taken to enforce the collection of rents. As I understand, there is a desire on the part of all persons who should have any charge or control of the matter to have the law certain and definite, so that persons occupying the wharf may be compelled to contribute to the expenses of the District such reasonable rental as may be charged.

At present there is no proper or adequate police control over this property, and there ought to be regulations not only enacted, but enforced to preserve peace and order and to prevent nuisances. At present no adequate regulations are in existence, and it is desired primarily that this shall be done. In fact, this is one of the principal reasons for the recommendation of the passage of this measure. Respecting the trapezoids and the circles, etc., there is no question between the Departments.

Mr. CANNON. Before my friend leaves this branch of the matter, I want to ask him a question. If I understand it, this bill gives the control of all the wharfage belonging to the United States and the whole water front of the District of Columbia and the rents and profits arising therefrom to the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. With perhaps this modification, if the gentleman will permit me: This bill may be so construed as not to include the Arsenal; but aside from that I would answer the gentleman affirmatively.

Mr. CANNON. Well, now, if it is desirable to do it and not desirable to include the Arsenal, does not the gentleman think his committee ought to offer the proper amendment excepting the Arsenal?

Mr. KING. Well, if the gentleman will permit me, I will say that this measure to which I have just invited attention has been submitted to us since the consideration of the bill in committee and the preparation of our report. We understood at the time that the bill which was submitted and which was drawn at the solicitation of the chairman of the Senate committee included only that which was agreeable not only to the War Department, but to the Commissioners. We thought there was no controversy. It appears from this letter that perhaps there is some question as to whether or not it included too much.

Mr. CANNON. Now, will the gentleman offer that amendment during the consideration of this bill?

Mr. KING. I would not care to do so without consultation with the chairman of the committee. I will say this, however, that if it is desired by the Department, and the bill does not exclude it from the control and jurisdiction of the District Commissioners, speaking for myself, I shall have no objection whatever when the bill goes to the Senate to having this amendment included.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I think we had better make our bill as nearly right as we can, because my observation is that when you depend upon the Senate to get an amendment you get it if it suits the Senate. It seems to me that if for any reason—and I am not expressing any opinion—the Arsenal grounds should not go under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Commissioners, so far as the water front is concerned, that on the gentleman's own statement that exception ought to be made. The gentleman might ask why I do not offer the amendment. Simply because I am not familiar with it and the gentleman is.

Mr. KING. Well, I think, if there is no objection from the chairman of the committee [Mr. BABCOCK], I will consent to the amendment and add as a proviso, at the end of section 1, the following:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be constructed to give said Commissioners jurisdiction or custody over the following-described property, to wit: The banks of the Potomac River from the north line of the Arsenal grounds to the southern curb line of N street south, and also 500 linear feet of shore line in the flushing reservoir at the foot of Seventeenth street west, and west from the western curb of said street, including a levee 100 feet wide, are hereby reserved for the use of the United States and placed under the immediate jurisdiction of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, who shall, for the protection and preservation of the rights of the United States to the property above described, have the same powers as are conferred in detail upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for wharfage purposes in other parts.

That is the amendment which is suggested by Colonel Bingham.

Mr. CANNON. Would he necessarily not have that power, and much other power which the Commissioners of the District of Columbia do not have? He is controlling property that the Government owns.

Mr. KING. In the bill which has been submitted for our consideration he seems willing to submit to such limitations as were placed upon the Commissioners.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that neither the committee nor the Commissioners nor anyone else had any idea of taking possession of any Government reservations or Government property under this bill. These old wharves have been squatted upon, and for a series of years the Government has been trying to get possession of them. The Commissioners have had suits that have gone clear to the Supreme Court, extending over a number of years, and the gentleman probably knows as much about that as I do, or more.

Now, the squatters on these wharves refuse to recognize either the Chief of Engineers or the District Commissioners as being in possession of authority to rent these wharves. They say to the Commissioners, "Where is your authority?" They say to the Chief of Engineers, "Where is your authority to collect rent or to make regulations?" That is the situation. Now, what we want to do is to define who shall have the authority, and there is no thought of anything else. To my mind that amendment is entirely needless; but if it clears up the matter in the mind of anybody, it does no harm.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want to ask further what amount of revenues is it estimated the water front of Washington will yield?

Mr. BABCOCK. They have not been getting anything practically, because the parties refused to pay rent.

Mr. CANNON. What is the estimate?

Mr. KING. There was no estimate or statement presented to the committee.

Mr. BABCOCK. The question was not gone into at all.

Mr. CANNON. Should there not be an amendment providing that the amount received from leasing should be paid into the Treasury?

Mr. KING. Of the United States?

Mr. CANNON. Of the United States, and not regarded as a part of the District revenues.

Mr. KING. Let me make this observation in reply: Does the gentleman think that if the District goes to the expense necessary to make surveys and perhaps to eject the persons who may be unlawfully occupying a portion of the wharfage, and of exercising police jurisdiction and control, of abating nuisances and in general assuming that authority which a municipality must of necessity assume over property of this character and this importance, it would be right and fair to deprive it of any of the rentals that might be received from the leasing? It is clear that the amount received from rentals will not compensate for all the trouble incident to a proper police control over the property.

Mr. CANNON. If the United States gives away the fee—for the United States owns the fee—

Mr. KING. Pardon me; the United States is not giving away the fee. It is merely committing the police control of this property to a quasi legislative and executive body.

Mr. CANNON. The expenses of that police control of United States property are paid one-half from the District revenues and one-half from the Treasury of the United States, and the fee belongs to the United States. Now, at least, the money that is received should be deposited not exceeding one-half for the benefit of the District, because the United States Treasury pays one-half for even the very policing and everything that is done by the District Commissioners. I do not know what the wharfage here ought to be worth. If I should be told that it was worth $100,000 a year I should not dispute it, or that it was worth $25,000—

Mr. KING. The gentleman must remember that this is not a commercial center.

Mr. CANNON. Whether it is much or little, it seems to me the bill ought to be amended in that respect.

Mr. BABCOCK. I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the bill does not attempt to touch that question at all. For years the Commissioners have rented all the wharfage they could control and collect upon. The Commissioners have fought these suits through and got possession of these wharves.

Mr. KING. Of a portion.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now the question is of conferring upon some one the right to collect. This money has been paid for years, with other taxes, into the United States Treasury or the District treasury, the committee are unable to state which, but we do not propose and have not proposed to change the system. The Commissioners of the District have made the fight and have recovered possession of these wharves against the squatters, and not the General Government.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. I have no doubt, then, that the bill ought to state what shall become of these revenues. For instance, the Commissioners personally ought not to keep them for their own benefit.

Mr. BABCOCK. Of course not.

Mr. CANNON. Second, they ought not to be revenues for the District of Columbia alone, to the exclusion of the United States Treasury, because the very policing and all expenses in connection therewith are paid for, one-half from the Federal Treasury and one-half from the District revenues under our system.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, right there, if that is the case, is it any reason why the money should be turned into the United States Treasury?

Mr. CANNON. At least half.

Mr. BABCOCK. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have made this fight and have obtained possession of the wharves.

Mr. CANNON. But the District of Columbia has made the fight and got United States property into its possession at the joint expense of the United States and the District of Columbia.

Mr. COWHERD. Does not the bill leave the revenues derived from the United States Treasury and the revenues from the District proper in the District treasury? The bill does not change the sense.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will tell me how much—as I understand, the District of Columbia does not own a foot of this river front. Can the gentleman from Utah enlighten me upon that?

Mr. KING. I think that is true. I think the United States would have the riparian rights—would have the wharfage. As I understand, it is vested in the United States. So far as I am concerned, speaking for myself only, I think it matters very little in the long run, when you come to balance the account between the District of Columbia and the United States, whether the whole of it is covered into the District treasury or one-half of it. I do not think it would amount to more than a very few dollars.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I would rather, whether it be much or little, that the right thing should be done. I suggest to the gentleman, as he is doubtless familiar with the bill, that he amend his bill in that regard.

Mr. KING. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is half and half.

Mr. KING. Half and half.

Mr. CANNON. While that amendment is being prepared, I want to ask the gentleman one other question. Does this bill have the effect to lodge title in the District of Columbia to any of the water front?

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. CANNON. Then, in the event that the bill should pass and the United States for any purpose should see proper to take that or any portion of the water front of the District of Columbia, it could take it without any compensation, legal or equitable, to the District of Columbia?

Mr. KING. Unquestionably; but I desire to make this proviso. I understand that some private persons claim to have some rights acquired by purchase, accretion, or reliction—I do not know exactly the basis of their claim. That would be subject to litigation; but outside of that, I would say, that the United States could at any time repeal this law and assume absolute control of the water front.

Mr. CANNON. Without being responsible legally or equitably to anybody?

Mr. KING. Unquestionably.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask one further question. What effect, if any, does this legislation have upon the land that was reclaimed at the exclusive expense of the United States, known as the Kidwell Flats?

Mr. KING. I think it would simply place them under the control, for the purpose of exercising police jurisdiction, of the District of Columbia, the same as the remaining wharfage, if it is wharfage. I am not familiar with that tract.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman got his amendment ready?

Mr. KING. I have not prepared one, but it seems to me this will cover it:

All rents so collected by said Commissioners shall be divided, one-half being covered into the Treasury of the United States and the remaining half into the treasury of the District of Columbia.

Does that amendment cover the proposition, as the gentleman understands it?

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, let me ask one question, to determine that. It is anticipated that the expense in caring for the water front should be covered as the District appropriations are—that is, half and half.

Mr. KING. I think so.

Mr. CANNON. Well, now, with that understanding, and if such be the fact, why it seems to me that the amendment that my friend refers to would be just. I hope my friend will offer it.

Mr. KING. If the gentleman will just permit me I will submit it in writing.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE. I should like to ask a question, for information. If you confer the right on the District of Columbia to lease this property, suppose they should make a lease for fifty years?

Mr. CANNON. I am glad my friend asked that question.

Mr. GREENE. How would the United States get control of it before the expiration of that lease? They might lease it for ninety-nine years.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me they ought to make the lease for one, or two, or five years, as the case may be.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman repeat his question?

Mr. GREENE. By this bill, as I gather it, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are permitted to lease this wharfage front, and there is no restriction in the bill as to the length of time for which they may lease it. Now, suppose the bill pass and the Commissioners should lease the property for fifty or ninety-nine years, how would the Government regain possession of the property before the expiration of the lease?

Mr. KING. The only way, I presume, that could be done would be by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, if the lease were made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Like it is now.

Mr. KING. I do not think the doctrine of caveat emptor would so apply that the lessee could be deprived of possession anterior to the time of the expiration of the lease unless due compensation were made, and that could only be done by the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

Mr. GREENE. Do you not think it would be proper to so amend the bill as to limit the period of time for which the Commissioners may lease these lands?

Mr. KING. I do not think any limitation ought to be placed in the bill. Perhaps a provision giving to the Commissioners or the Government the right to terminate any lease so made at pleasure might cover that.

Mr. GREENE. I think that ought to be done.

Mr. KING. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman's statement, that this bill was not prepared by the committee. It was submitted, as the committee understood, as the unanimous request and as the result of the combined wisdom of the Commissioners and the War Department. It was not given that consideration which would be given to measures originating with the committee. It was submitted by them as a measure which was supposed to cover the defects now existing, and we took it as a matter of course that it embodied the ideas they wished to crystallize into law. If the gentleman from Nebraska will prepare an amendment to cover his suggestion, I will offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). Is further general debate desired?

Mr. CANNON. There is another matter, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire about.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order, the bill will have to be read by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Utah may offer his amendment now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Utah may offer an amendment at this stage. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 2 the following:

"All rents so collected shall be divided, one-half being covered into the United States Treasury and the remainder into the District treasury."

Mr. CANNON. I think the better way would be to say that all rents shall be covered into the United States Treasury, one-half to the credit of the United States and one-half to be credited to the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the regular form.

Mr. KING. Then I will modify my amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think it politic to place some limitation upon the time that leases should run? Nine hundred and ninety-nine years would be equivalent to a sale, and so would a lease of ninety-nine years. I do not know how valuable this water front is, but if it was adjacent to Chicago or New York it would be worth millions.

Mr. KING. I agree with the gentleman. I think perhaps a lease should not be executed which would be equivalent to a sale of the property.

Mr. GREENE. Can you not so amend the bill as to provide that all leases shall cease or shall be forfeited at the pleasure of the Government at the end of one year?

Mr. CANNON. You may build upon wharf property the same as any other property. An elevator might be built upon it involving a considerable expense. Now, it seems to me not desirable that the Government should be called upon to condemn the property. It seems to me there ought to be a lease authorized to run long enough to enable the lessee to put such improvements upon it as would enable him to use it, and at the end of its term it would return to the Government in the condition in which it had been placed. I should think probably a lease not exceeding ten years would be acceptable.

Mr. KING. I think persons would be willing to erect buildings sufficient for all purposes under a ten-years lease.

Mr. CANNON. Then I would suggest, if that meets the approval, that leases not longer than ten years be authorized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING] as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of section 2 the following:

"All rents so collected shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States, one-half to be placed to the credit of the United States and one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. How would an amendment in these words satisfy the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]? "All leases under the provisions of this act shall not extend beyond a period of ten years."

Mr. MAHON. I would insert the word "privileges"—"leases and privileges."

Mr. KING. The word "lease," being the term employed for the permission of the person to occupy the wharfage, I think would cover privileges.

Mr. CANNON. The greater includes the less, I think.

Mr. MAHON. How about the third section of the bill, where it gives exclusive control of all places within the lines of streets to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia? The Commissioners could fill the street full of railways without coming to Congress at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the amendment agreed upon the following:

"No lease under the provisions of this act shall extend beyond a period of ten years."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. On page 21, line 19, the bill says—

As a park or reservation, shall be vested in the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, who shall also have control of any land acquired for park purposes under the act approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities."

Now, that act for a permanent system of highways, as I understand, has been repealed as far as the House is concerned, and probably will be absolutely repealed.

Mr. KING. I think the Senate, if we can believe the daily press, has provided a modification of the old highway act, and has not accepted the repealing act which recently passed the House.

Mr. CANNON. It is practically repealed; it is practically a dead letter. Now, whether the Senate acquiesces or not, that power I am satisfied works a virtual repeal—a practical repeal. In other words, I do not believe that the House would ever assent to appropriations to carry out that act. But under the highway act, if I understand aright, everything that is done is at the expense of the District revenues alone.

Now, if I understand this bill, it proposes that the parks which may hereafter be made under the highway act shall be put under the jurisdiction of the Chief of Engineers. It seems to me that would not be wise and that the provision in question ought to be stricken out. All these reservations in the city proper have been construed to be the property of the United States and are maintained at the exclusive expense of the United States. I do not believe that they ought to be. I think that as they are substantially for the benefit of the District of Columbia and the whole country, the expense of maintaining them ought to be divided half and half between the United States and the District. But under the provisions of this bill parks 3, 4, 5, or 6 miles from where we now stand will, if the highway act should be put into operation, be placed under the control of the Chief of Engineers, which means the maintenance of that control in perpetuity.

Mr. BABCOCK. Has the gentleman any amendment to offer?

Mr. CANNON. I think that provision of the bill ought to be struck out.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman offer an amendment to that effect?

Mr. CANNON. I think I shall do so, if I am right in my view.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman is absolutely right. I never knew him to be wrong. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. That is quite a compliment.

Mr. BABCOCK. I believe that, as the gentleman states, the highway act is practically repealed; and if that is so, this provision has no effect whatever; it is mere verbiage.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose the highway act is not repealed, does my friend think this a wise provision?

Mr. BABCOCK. This is simply a continuance of what has been the practice in this city. But for a provision of this kind, you might have a park on one side of Florida avenue under the charge of the Chief of Engineers and a park on the other side under the charge of somebody else. The War Department has been very solicitous about the control of the reservations belonging to the Government.

Mr. CANNON. I know that is so. Men like power. And when you extend the appropriation that is made exclusively from United States revenues to maintain this multitude of little parks it involves watchmen, laborers, etc., under the authority of the Chief of Engineers. Authority of this kind public officers do not like to give up. But there is no reason, so far as I have been able to discover, why every park in the District of Columbia should not be controlled, as many of them are, by the Commissioners and at the joint expense of the District and the United States Treasury, rather than have the United States pay one-half of the expense of maintaining the parks controlled by the Commissioners, and the whole expense of maintaining the parks controlled by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. KING. I think the gentleman is entirely correct. I can not understand why there should be a division; but the division does exist; and in reporting this bill I dealt with an existing condition. It does seem to me, however, that if all the parks in the city were committed to the jurisdiction of the Commissioners, it would be infinitely better than the present arrangement; there would be less clashing, less uncertainty, less difficulty. But such a condition does exist, and the committee did not feel at liberty, after consideration of the subject, to propose the repeal of a system which has existed for so long a time.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will, with the gentleman's assent, move an amendment to strike out that clause of the bill beginning with the word "who," in line 20, page 21, and ending with the word "cities," in line 25 of the same page.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MUDD. What is the effect of the amendment?

Mr. CANNON. It will leave the jurisdiction and care of parks which may be hereafter created under the highway act just as it is now.

Mr. MUDD. Under the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know where it is now; but this provision of the bill would certainly put it under the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. MUDD. Not under the Commissioners?

Mr. KING. I am inclined to think that all the parks to be created in the future should, without additional legislation, be committed to the control of the Commissioners, and there, I think, the control ought to be lodged.

Mr. MUDD. I do not think it ought to reside there.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that my amendment be read.

The amendment of Mr. CANNON was read, as follows:

In lines 20 to 25, on page 21, strike out these words:

"Who shall also have control of any land acquired for park purposes under the act approved March 2, 1893, entitled 'An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities.'"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent to offer the amendment just read. Is there objection?

Mr. MUDD. I do not object to the consideration of the amendment, but I do not think it ought to be adopted.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the amendment; and it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is further general debate desired? If not, the Clerk will proceed to read the bill by sections.

Mr. BABCOCK. I have an amendment which I should like to offer, if there is no objection on the part of the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Well, I shall be glad to hear what my friend proposes to offer.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the bill the following as a new section:

SEC. 5. Provided, That the park known as the Botanical Garden shall be open to the public the same as the other parks in the city of Washington; and within six months from the passage of this act the fence around the same shall be removed.

Mr. CANNON. I will reserve a point of order on that amendment until I know exactly what it means.

Mr. BABCOCK. It means that this unsightly fence down here shall be torn down.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, does it require unanimous consent for the offering of an amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does, because general debate has not been closed and the consideration of the bill by sections has not yet been entered upon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If there is to be a demand for the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule, amendments should be offered regularly. But I ask unanimous consent that general debate be now closed, that the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule be dispensed with, and that amendments may now be offered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that general debate be now closed, that the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule be dispensed with, and that any section be now open for amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Wisconsin offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The amendment of Mr. BABCOCK was read, as above.

Mr. CANNON. I think I will reserve a point of order upon that, merely to find out what it means.

Mr. BABCOCK. I desire to say to the gentleman from Illinois that right here in front of the Capitol, or perhaps, strictly speaking, in the rear, at the head of Pennsylvania avenue, there is the most unsightly old brick wall and iron fence to be found in the city of Washington. When you drive through that beautiful park, from the White House clear down to the corner of the grounds, and the entire length of the Mall, you are stopped at this Botanical Garden and can not drive up to the Capitol. The park was originally laid out and intended as it should be, but here you have a brick foundation with an iron fence on it, and everything is shut out. The only purpose that I know that it serves is to keep Jersey cows inside of it.

Mr. MAHON. And the gate is locked at 4 o'clock.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend be willing to modify his amendment so as to provide simply that the fence be taken down?

Mr. BABCOCK. That is all we want to accomplish.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose you modify it so as to accomplish that, and whether it is germane or not—

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I think there is much force in the remark of the gentleman who has charge of this bill in favor of removing that fence. In the first place, it is the park nearest the Capitol that has a fence around it. In the second place, almost all the other parks in the city have had the fences removed; and when you start from here to the Agricultural Department, or from here to the National Museum, or from here to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and attempt to go in a direct line, you have to go around this wall and over a portion of the city that is worse paved than any other.

In addition to that, the prettiest fountain in the city, one that I believe was designed by the great artist Bartholdi, and which, I believe, was also presented to the United States, is in there and fenced up. I know of no good that that great wall is accomplishing. The iron would better be sold as junk, in order to let the people through there, and I most sincerely hope that the gentleman's amendment will prevail. In truth, I believe that if you will come down to the solid facts of the matter, the removal of that whole establishment over there to the Agricultural grounds or somewhere else, leaving the park open, would be a blessing to the country.

Mr. MAHON. I should like to see this amendment pass. In front of the Agricultural Department we have magnificent beds of flowers growing out in the open. There are hothouses all around the building in which flowers and plants are propagated, and that park is open day and night, without any injury being done to anything. That Department is far more useful to the Government than the Botanical Garden. The same reasons that have been assigned why the Botanical Park should be closed up would apply to the Agricultural Department.

It has been proven beyond all controversy that it is not necessary to have a fence around the Agricultural grounds. No person molests the flowers or hothouses, and there is no reason why this Botanical Park should not be open day and night. As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] has said, if you want to pass up from the magnificent park below, you must make a detour to get around the Botanical Garden, which is fenced up. I am in favor of the amendment to tear down this fence and throw the park open to the public. There are plenty of men to take care of it day and night, and they are paid well for it.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, regarding this amendment, I differ with my friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] and my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON]. This amendment should not prevail, and I hope the members of the House will vote it down. I think it would be injurious and perhaps disastrous to the Botanical Gardens, with their magnificent grounds and wonderful greenhouses, containing invaluable shrubs, plants, trees, and flowers, if the fence now around the gardens were removed.

I have just been informed by a gentleman from the gardens, and who is connected with them, that if this fence is removed, all the shrubs, flowers, and plants which have taken years and years to cultivate and grow and which are near to the fence will be destroyed or injured. If this is so, the irreparable loss, in my judgment, would be much greater than any gain that could accrue by the removal of the iron fence which I believe has been there for years. These shrubs, plants, and flowers, and many of the trees, are marks of great beauty, and their growth has been slow, so slow indeed that it has taken years of toil and constant care for them to reach their present size. Some of them are so near the fence that they would be destroyed if this fence is removed. This is a very important amendment, it seems to me, and one that should not be adopted hastily.

Let us consider the matter for a few moments. These Botanical Gardens are the finest in the country; they are one of the great sights of the capital city; they contain the rarest and the choicest flowers, wonderful plants from all over the world, shrubs of the most delicate nature, and magnificent trees, many of them planted by distinguished persons in the history of our country. In my opinion these gardens should have some protection from the vandal and the gatherer of souvenirs. Then, again, stray animals may roam around and get in and do more damage in a night than can be repaired in years.

Mr. MAHON. They do not roam around in this city.

Mr. SULZER. Well, you can not tell what will happen, and if these animals get into the park, you can not tell what injury they might do. I think we should be sure, and for one I am going to be sure, and vote against this amendment. It ought to be beaten.

Mr. MAHON. The same condition exists around the Agricultural Department grounds. There are beautiful shrubs and flower beds and greenhouses in that park, and they have been there ever since it has been a park. There are no cattle or other animals running through the streets to do any injury. They have guards at the Agricultural Department day and night to watch the grounds, and they have them at the Botanical Garden. I think it should be opened to the public. If it is fenced up for the benefit of Mr. Smith, let him pay for running it.

Mr. SULZER. Let me say to my friend that the Botanical Gardens are open to the public now all day long, and always have been. They are not fenced in for the benefit of Mr. Smith, but for their protection from vandalism, and for the benefit of the general public. The damage that will be done if the fence is removed will not be done during the day, but at night, by animals and predatory persons. To prevent this will require a regiment of guards. There is a great difference between the Botanical Gardens and Agricultural grounds. In fact, there is no similarity between them.

My friend has mentioned the name of Mr. Smith. Mr. William R. Smith is, has been for nearly forty years, and will, I hope, continue to be as long as he lives the director of the Botanical Gardens. He has done a wondrous work in those gardens—a work that is his monument, and one more enduring than marble or brass; a work that has gladdened and benefited mankind. The plants which he has grown and propagated there have been distributed all over the land, and have brightened many a sad home and shed perfume in many a despondent heart. The good his labor has done can not be estimated. I know him and I like him. I am glad to say he is my friend. He is a wise, far-seeing, philosophical man. The Botanical Gardens are his creation and his workshop. He lives in them. He is a botanist, a floriculturist, and a horticulturist. [Applause.]

I do not know what his wishes are in this matter, but I am informed that he is opposed to the removal of this fence. If you believe in his work, his wishes should control. The gardens are open now, as I said before, from early in the morning until 5 or 6 o'clock at night, and any visitor to or resident of Washington can go there during those hours, and that ought to be amply sufficient.

Mr. MAHON. You can not drive through there at all.

Mr. SULZER. You could not, if the fence were down. There are no wagon roads or drives in the Botanical Gardens. I want to say that Mr. Smith is deserving of the lasting gratitude of the people of this country for what he has done to beautify the home and the land. He has educated the people to a realization of and a cultivation of the beautiful in nature, and I say that if he is opposed to a removal of this fence, his desire ought to be consulted by the members of this House.

I am absolutely opposed to this amendment, and I hope it will be voted down.

It ought to be beaten. We ought to stand by the director of the Botanical Gardens and do all we can to help him in the great, the noble, and the beneficial work and lasting good he is doing for the whole country.

Many of you may not appreciate the great work Mr. Smith is doing, but those who do praise him most highly and say his work and the good that results from it in a thousand ways can not be estimated or calculated. Every section of the country can testify to it, however, in living words of nature.

Mr. SIMPSON. Is this the Mr. Smith who presides over the Botanical Garden?

Mr. SULZER. Yes, my friend, the same Mr. Smith.

Mr. SIMPSON. Of whom it is said that he is the wet nurse of new Congressmen, in the way of supplying them with flowers and such things.

Mr. SULZER. He may have been the wet nurse of the gentleman from Kansas. I know nothing about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. I just wanted to know if it was the same Mr. Smith.

Mr. SULZER. Yes, it is the same Mr. Smith; and I am glad of this opportunity to say what I have about him. I know one thing about Mr. Smith, and that is this, that the great, laborious, and magnificent work he has done during the last forty years for all the people of this country as the popular and well-known director of the Botanical Gardens is a wondrous work, while to him it has been a work of love and has benefited every section of this land.

I raise the point of order against this amendment, that it is not germane to the subject.

Mr. BABCOCK. It is too late to raise that.

Mr. SULZER. I think not; all points of order were reserved.

Mr. GAINES. I should like to ask what is the difference between this park and the other parks that are open in the vicinity?

Mr. SULZER. One question at a time, please.

Mr. BABCOCK. The point of order raised by the gentleman from New York is too late. The amendment has been under discussion for some time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois reserved points of order.

Mr. SULZER. I understood that the gentleman from Illinois reserved all points of order. And I insist on my point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only question is whether the amendment is germane to the bill. The Chair thinks the amendment is germane to the bill, and therefore overrules the point of order of the gentleman from New York. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SULZER. I differ with the Chair, but will not take up the time of the House by an appeal.

Mr. GAINES. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. SULZER. I shall be glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. GAINES. What is the distinction between this park and the other grounds in the vicinity? Why should a fence be around this park and not around the other parks?

Mr. SULZER. I tried to make that clear. On account of the valuable plants, flowers, shrubs, and trees which are so near the fence that if it were removed they would be destroyed or injured.

Mr. GAINES. There are shrubs and valuable trees in the other parks.

Mr. SULZER. Quite true; but yet this case is entirely different. Besides cows, horses, dogs, and other animals might get in the Botanical Gardens at night and do much damage.

Mr. GAINES. Cows do not eat shrubs. They may up in New York, where they have nothing but snow and bad Democracy and Republicanism to live on.

Mr. SULZER. My friend should also know that there are greenhouses in these gardens where they propagate rare plants. These might be stolen or injured at night if the gardens were open.

Mr. McMILLIN. They have the same things over in the Agricultural grounds, and there is no fence around those grounds.

Mr. SULZER. Suffice it for me to say that I am satisfied that if the fence is removed from the Botanical Gardens a great injury may be done to the plants, flowers, shrubbery, and trees. That is the information which I receive, and I shall act on it and do all I can against this amendment.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman inform the House how many cows are kept inside of that fence now?

Mr. SULZER. None that I know of; but I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that in these piping times of war a cow, or a horse, or a dog, or some other animal may break out at any time. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES. I do not think there has been a cow within a hundred miles of this city in fifty years, judging by the kind of milk we have to drink. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I insist on my opposition to this amendment, and will demand a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this matter, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia has accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois that provides only that the fence shall be taken down. If that is so, then I would like to be assured that no shrubs or plants shall be removed and no paths laid out that will interfere with the workings of the Botanic Garden.

Mr. BABCOCK. Nothing of that kind would be done. The grounds would be thrown open for the use of the public, the same as the other parks.

Mr. McMILLIN. You would not have to drive around there perpetually, and the people could see it.

Mr. McEWAN. I take great interest in forestry and think this a very important feature of our country's welfare. To show somewhat incidentally what good is done by botanical gardens, I would say that during the last few years over 80,000 North Carolina poplar trees have been propagated throughout the United States from young trees sent from that one tree in the Botanic Garden. I only cite that as one instance of its value and importance.

Mr. BABCOCK. The fence has nothing to do with the poplar. Mr. McEWAN. I quite agree with that, except that the fence is unpopular. [Laughter.]

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SULZER. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 6.

Mr. SULZER. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings for a call, including the point of no quorum, be vacated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is counting now.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, this bill is being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Would not the same rule apply as in Committee of the Whole, 100 being a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. We are still in the House. One hundred and sixty-six gentlemen present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Clerk will call the roll, and gentlemen as their names are called will vote on the amendment.

Mr. TALBERT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask what we are to vote upon. I ask that the amendment be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The amendment was again read.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 120, noes 63, answered "present" 26, not voting 146; as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at end of section 1 the following:

"Provided, That the following-described property shall be placed under the immediate jurisdiction and control of the Chief of Engineers of the United States: The banks of the Potomac River from the north line of the arsenal grounds to the southern curb line of N street south; also 500 linear feet of shore line in the flushing reservoir at the foot of Seventeenth street west and west from the western curb of said street, including a levee 100 feet wide."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the last section will be numbered 6 instead of 5.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LICENSE TAX ON MERRY-GO-ROUNDS, ETC.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10278) imposing a license tax upon proprietors of merry-go-rounds or other mechanical devices operated or exhibited for purposes of public amusement for gain, and for other purposes, in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10278) imposing a license tax upon proprietors of merry-go-rounds or other mechanical devices operated or exhibited for purposes of public amusement for gain, and for other purposes, in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a license tax is hereby imposed as follows: The proprietors of merry-go-rounds, flying horses, carousels, flying swings, or other mechanical devices operated or exhibited for purposes of public amusement for gain, shall pay the sum of $3 per day or $12 per week, and hereafter it shall be unlawful for said proprietors to do business in the District of Columbia without first obtaining a license from the assessor of the District of Columbia.

Any person or persons violating the provisions of this act shall, on conviction thereof in the police court of said District, pay a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $25, or be imprisoned in the workhouse for a period of not exceeding thirty days. The assessor of said District is hereby authorized to grant or refuse the license in his discretion for any of the purposes mentioned in this act or to annul for cause a license already granted: Provided, however, That the owner of any license issued under this act and so revoked shall be entitled to a refund of a proportionate amount of his unused license.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

"Insert the word 'like' in the caption of the bill and also in line 5, after the word 'other,' so that it will read, 'or other like mechanical devices.'"

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the title will be amended.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

In such event it shall be the duty of said company at once to change its said railway and the pavement so as to conform to such grades and improvements as may have been established.

SEC. 6. That it shall be lawful for said railway company, its successors or assigns, having first obtained the permission of the District Commissioners therefor, to make all needful and convenient trenches and excavations in any of said streets or places where said railway company may have the right to construct and operate its road, and place in such trenches and excavations all needful and convenient devices and machinery for operating said railroad in the same manner and by the means herein provided, but shall forthwith restore the street to like good condition as it was before. But whenever such trenches or excavations shall interfere with any sewer, gas, or water pipes, or any subways or conduits, or any public work of the kind, then the expense necessary to change such underground constructions shall be borne by the said railway company.

SEC. 7. That it shall also be lawful for said corporation, its successors or assigns, to erect and maintain, on private grounds, at such convenient and suitable points along its lines as may seem most desirable to the board of directors of the said corporation, and subject to the approval of the said Commissioners, an engine house or houses, boiler house, and all other buildings necessary for the successful operation of the said railroad.

SEC. 8. That the line of the said railroad shall be commenced within one year and completed within two years from date of the passage of this act; and in default of such commencement or completion within the time in this section specified, all rights, franchises, and privileges granted by this act shall immediately cease and determine.

SEC. 9. That the said company may run its cars by the overhead-trolley electric system, or such other electric or mechanical system as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may approve. Steam power shall not be used: Provided, That if electric power by trolley be used a return wire similar in capacity and insulation to the feed wire shall be provided, and each car shall be provided with a double trolley, and no pole of any dynamo furnishing power to the railway shall be connected with the earth: Provided further, That for the purpose of making a continuous connection over the route hereinbefore described the said company shall have the right to cross all streets, avenues, and highways that may be along the designated route: Provided further, That whenever the foregoing route or routes may coincide with the route or routes of any duly incorporated street railway company in the District of Columbia the tracks shall be used by both companies, which are hereby authorized and empowered to use such tracks in common, upon such fair and equitable terms as may be agreed upon by said companies; and in the event the said companies fail to agree upon equitable terms, either of said companies may apply by petition to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which shall immediately provide for proper notice to and hearing of all parties interested, and shall have power to determine the terms and conditions upon which, and the regulations under which, the company hereby incorporated shall be entitled so to use and enjoy the track of such other street railway company, and the amount and manner of compensation to be paid therefor: And provided further, That neither of the companies using such track in common shall be permitted to make the track so used in common the depot or general stopping place to await passengers, but shall only be entitled to use the same for the ordinary passage of its cars, with the ordinary halts for taking up and dropping off passengers: Provided further, That this shall not apply to or interfere with any station already established on any existing lines. That said corporation is authorized and empowered to propel its cars over the lines of any other road or roads which may be in alignment with, and upon such streets as may be covered by, the route or routes as prescribed in this act, in accordance with the conditions hereinbefore contained; and that this corporation shall construct and repair such portions of its road as may be upon the line or routes of any other road thus used; and in case of any disagreement with any company whose line of road is thus used, such disagreement may be summarily determined upon the application of either road to any court in said District having competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 10. That the said company shall furnish and maintain passenger houses, provided with such conveniences for the public as required by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall use first-class cars on said railway, with all modern improvements for the convenience, comfort, and safety of passengers, and shall run cars as often as the public convenience may require, in accordance with a time-table, to be subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 11. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may make such regulations as to the speed, mode of use of tracks, and the removal of ice and snow as in their judgment the interest and the convenience of the public may require. Should the servants or the agents of said company willfully or negligently violate such an ordinance or regulation, said company shall be liable to the District of Columbia for a penalty not exceeding $500.

SEC. 12. That within thirty days after the passage of this act the corporation named in the first section, their associates, successors, or assigns, or a majority of them, or, if any refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall meet at some convenient and accessible place in the District of Columbia for the organization of said company and for the receiving of subscriptions to the capital stock of the company: Provided, That every subscriber shall pay at the time of subscribing 10 per cent in cash of the amount by him subscribed to the treasurer appointed by the corporation, or his substitute shall be null and void: Provided further, That nothing shall be received in payment of the 10 per cent at the time of subscribing except lawful money or certified checks from any established national bank. And when the books of the subscription to the capital stock of said company shall be closed the corporations named in the first section, their associates, successors, or assigns, or a majority of them, and in case any of them refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall, within twenty days after, call the first meeting of the stockholders of the said company to meet within ten days thereafter for the choice of directors, of which public notice shall be given for five days in two daily newspapers published in the city of Washington, and by written personal notice to be mailed to the address of each stockholder by the clerk of the corporation; and in all meetings of the stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy.

SEC. 13. That the government and direction of affairs of the company shall be vested in a board of directors, nine in number, who shall be stockholders of record, and who shall hold their office for one year, and until others are duly elected and qualified to take their places as directors; and the said directors, a majority of whom shall be a quorum, shall elect one of their number to be president of the board, who shall also be president of the company, and they shall also choose a vice president, a secretary, and a treasurer, who shall give bond with surety to said company, in such sums as the said directors may require, for the faithful discharge of his trust. In the case of a vacancy in the board of directors by the death, resignation, or otherwise of any director the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled by the remaining directors.

SEC. 14. That the directors shall have the power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper touching the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company not contrary to the charter or to the laws of the United States and the ordinances of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 15. That there shall be at least an annual meeting of the stockholders for choice of directors, to be held at such time in the District of Columbia, under such conditions, and upon such notice as the said company in their by-laws may prescribe; and said directors shall annually make a report in writing of their doings to the stockholders.

SEC. 16. That said company is hereby authorized to issue its capital stock to an amount not to exceed the estimated cost of the construction and equipment of the road, in shares of $50 each, and to issue bonds not to exceed the cost of construction of the road, but such stock and bonds shall not exceed in the aggregate more than the actual cost of the right of way, construction, and equipment of said road. Said company shall require the subscribers to the capital stock to pay in cash to the treasurer appointed by the corporation the amounts severally subscribed by them, as follows, namely: Ten per cent at the time of subscribing and the balance of such subscription to be paid at such times and in such amounts as the board of directors may require; and no subscription shall be deemed valid unless the 10 per cent thereof shall be paid at the time of subscribing, as hereinbefore provided; and if any stockholder shall refuse or neglect to pay any installment as aforesaid, or as required by the resolution of the board of directors, after reasonable notice of the same, the said board of directors may sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, so many shares of his stock as shall pay said installments, and the person who offers to purchase the least number of shares for the assessment due shall be taken to be the highest bidder, and such sale shall be conducted under such general regulations as may be adopted in the by-laws of the said company; but no stock shall be sold for less than the total assessments due and payable, or said corporation may sue and collect the same from any delinquent subscriber in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That no certificates of stock shall be issued until the same has been paid for in money at its face value.

SEC. 17. That all articles of value that may be inadvertently left in any of the cars or other vehicles of the said company shall be taken to its principal depot and entered in a book of record of unclaimed goods, which book shall be open to the inspection of the public at all reasonable hours of business.

SEC. 18. That the East Washington Heights Traction Company shall annually pay to the District of Columbia a franchise tax of five-eighths of 1 per cent of the entire gross earnings of such company, and a personal tax of 2 per cent per annum on the entire gross earnings of said company. There shall also be levied and collected upon all of the real estate of said company a tax in the same manner and to the same extent as upon all other real estate in the District of Columbia; said taxes shall be due and payable, subject to the same penalties on arrears, and collectible in the same manner as other taxes in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 19. That said company shall receive a rate of fare not exceeding 5 cents per passenger; but six tickets shall be sold for 25 cents: Provided, That the said company and the Capital Traction Company are hereby required to issue free transfers, whereby a passenger on the said East Washington Heights Traction Company shall be entitled to a continuous ride over the line of the other company, or vice versa.

SEC. 20. That the said company shall have at all times the free and uninterrupted use of the roadway, subject to the rights of the public, and if any person or persons shall willfully, mischievously, and unlawfully obstruct or impede the passage of cars of said railway company with a vehicle or vehicles, or otherwise, or in any manner molest or interfere with passengers or operatives while in transit, or destroy or injure the cars of said railway, or depots, stations, or other property belonging to the said railway company, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars, to be recovered as other fines and penalties in said District, and shall remain liable, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his or her or their act as aforesaid; but no suit shall be brought unless commenced within sixty days after such offense shall have been committed.

SEC. 21. That the East Washington Heights Traction Company shall have the right of way across such other railways as are now in operation within the limits of the lines granted by this act, and is hereby authorized to construct its said road across such other railways: Provided, That it shall not interrupt the travel of such other railways in such construction.

SEC. 22. That no person shall be prohibited the right to travel on any part of said road, or be ejected from the cars by the company's employees, for any other cause than that of being drunk, disorderly, or contagiously diseased, or refusing to pay the legal fare exacted, or to comply with the lawful general regulations of the company.

SEC. 23. That in the event the company should not be able to come to an agreement with the owner or owners of any land through which the said road may be located or pass, or which may be needed for terminal facilities and passenger stations, proceedings for the condemnation for the use of the company of so much of said land as may be required, not exceeding 20 feet in width for a right of way, and such tracts as may be necessary for terminal facilities and passenger stations, may be instituted in the usual way in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, under such rules and regulations as said court may prescribe for such purposes: Provided, That any property owner shall have the right of trial by jury in such issue.

SEC. 24. That all plans of location and construction of tracks and other structures in public places pertaining to said railway shall be subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and all work thereof shall at all times be subject to their supervision. The said company shall, from time to time, deposit with the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia such amounts as may be deemed necessary by said Commissioners to cover the costs of inspection, supervision, changes to water pipes and sewer connections, changes of curb and pavement, and work not otherwise provided for, which may be made necessary by the location or grade of said railway. Any unexpended balance remaining after the construction of said road shall be returned to said company with an account in full of the disbursement of such deposits.

SEC. 25. That all the conditions, requirements, and obligations imposed by the terms of this act upon the East Washington Heights Traction Company shall be complied with by any and all the successors to and assigns of said company.

SEC. 26. That within sixty days from the approval of this act the company shall deposit $1,000 with the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia to guarantee the construction of its railway within the prescribed time. If this sum is not so deposited this charter shall be void. If the sum is so deposited and the road is not in operation as herein prescribed, said $1,000 shall be forfeited to the District of Columbia and this charter shall be void.

SEC. 27. That failure or neglect to comply with any of the provisions of this act, except as hereinbefore provided for, shall render the said corporation liable to a fine of $25 for each and every day during which such failure or neglect shall continue, which penalty may be recovered in the name of the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of the said District in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, however, That unless the line of the said railway shall be completed, with cars running regularly thereon for the accommodation of passengers, within two years from the date of the passage of this act, this charter shall be null and void.

SEC. 28. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer an amendment to section 8.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 3, section 8, on page 8, the following:

"Provided, That failure to commence to construct or to complete either of the said portions of the routes as provided for in section 1 of this act shall operate to repeal the authority to build said portion or portions, and shall not repeal the charter of said company: Provided, however, That the said railroad shall be commenced and completed within the time aforesaid from the circle at the western approach to the Pennsylvania avenue bridge to the District line, as hereinbefore provided."

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I think the committee will accept the amendment offered by my colleague. I want to add a word or two in explanation of this bill. The East Washington Heights Railroad commences at the circle at the western approach of the Pennsylvania Avenue Bridge; thence across Anacostia River on a bridge of its own construction, to be approved by the Secretary of War and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Every part of the railroad from the east end of the said bridge will be located in the southeastern portion of the District of Columbia, south and east of the western branch of the Anacostia River. It traverses a section of country not now occupied or covered by any railroad system. There are in this section about 11,000 people, very largely of the working class, without railroad facilities.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that more than 70 per cent of the property holders of that section are represented on the list of incorporators. Property holders and residents of that section representing, I believe, 97 per cent of the property there, have appeared before the Committee on the District of Columbia advocating the passage of this bill, and as an evidence of good faith on the part of these gentlemen I may say there has been already expended in property and improvements now being enjoyed by the public in that locality upward of $500,000.

I think the Committee on the District of Columbia will have no objection to the amendment offered by my friend from Maryland [Mr. MUDD], providing that the failure to commence or complete any portion of the road within the time prescribed shall operate only to forfeit the charter with respect to such portion, without causing a forfeiture with respect to the entire road.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will this road connect with the road on Pennsylvania avenue?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. The proposed extension of the Pennsylvania avenue line will carry their road to the western terminus of the Pennsylvania Avenue Bridge.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then the Pennsylvania avenue line will build their road down to the bridge?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Yes. We have provided in the bill for free transfers.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is what I want to get at. Would a passenger riding on the Pennsylvania avenue line to the bridge be obliged to pay another fare in order to go over to East Washington Heights?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Not at all.

Mr. SIMPSON. He could make the whole transit for one fare?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. There is a provision for free transfer.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MUDD, it was agreed to.

Mr. CORLISS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert in line 4, page 13, after the word "versus," the following:

"Provided further, That universal free transfers shall be issued and exchanged by said company and said Capital Traction Company with all street railways whose lines intersect the lines of said companies, so that a passenger shall be entitled to a continuous ride over the line of said companies and any line intersecting the same for one fare."

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to compel this company and the company with whose lines it will connect to give a universal transfer to any passenger desiring a continuous ride.

Mr. BABCOCK. Before this amendment is debated, I want to reserve a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order.

Mr. CORLISS. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the debate had begun. I had the floor and was proceeding with my remarks before the gentleman rose to reserve any point of order.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how there could be any opportunity to make the point, if the gentleman is to be regarded as holding the floor all the time after offering his amendment. I made my point as soon as I could get the Speaker's attention.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Wisconsin rose to make his point before the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] rose to debate the amendment, the point was certainly in time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No matter how it happened, the gentleman from Wisconsin was too late.

Mr. SIMPSON. The amendment had been read and debate begun before the gentleman made any point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Wisconsin rose to make his point of order after the amendment was read and before the debate had proceeded, then he was in time.

Mr. BABCOCK. I was in my seat all the time, and after the amendment had been read I took advantage of the first opportunity to attract the attention of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will accept the gentleman's statement. The point of order is reserved. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment will be manifest to every member of the House. This is one of the few cities where a person desiring to ride on the street cars from one point of the city to another is compelled sometimes to pay two fares. Now, I submit that in view of modern inventions, in view of the improvements which have been made in street railways and the increased facilities for carrying passengers, the time has arrived when any company operating a street railway in the city of Washington, or any city of its size, can give and should give to the traveling public, for a single fare, a continuous ride from one part of the city to any other part where street railroad lines extend, whether the lines be owned by a single company or by a dozen different companies. There is hardly a city in this country where the traveling public does not enjoy this facility. Even where different lines are owned by different railway companies universal transfers are granted to passengers desiring to make a continuous ride.

There is no reason why the Traction Company of this city should issue a transfer from its line on Pennsylvania avenue to its line on Seventh street and decline to grant a transfer to Ninth street because the Ninth street line is owned by some other company. Transfers are granted in this city from one line to another, if both lines are operated by the same company, and there is no reason why this system of transfers should not be universal without regard to the ownership of the different lines. A transfer costs nothing. This amendment would impose no additional burden or expense upon any of these corporations. This is a step in the right direction for the benefit of the traveling public in this city. I submit that the amendment should be adopted.

The argument may be made that this provision will require an amendment to the charter of some other railroad company. Then I say we can take up that question at another time. The point of order that the gentleman has made is not proper. This is an amendment to the section fixing the rate of fares, and it further provides that the company shall give a transfer, not only over the line of the company that gets this charter, but over the line of the company with which it connects. The language is:

Provided, That the said company and the Capital Traction Company are hereby required to issue free transfers, whereby a passenger on the said East Washington Heights Traction Company shall be entitled to a continuous ride over the line of the other company, or vice versa.

Now, I extend that provision so as to compel those two companies to give the same privilege to every other line that intersects their street railway lines, and I submit that it is germane, it is proper, it is right. It is something that the people of this city are entitled to, and I trust this House will grant it.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the point of order, I desire to say that this is an entirely new matter, which is not pertinent or germane to this bill—granting a charter for this road beyond the Anacostia River. This amendment provides that the Capital Traction Company shall give transfers over its lines to the Metropolitan, the Metropolitan to the Belt, the Belt to the other different lines, clear on throughout the city. It seems to me that it is a question that is not pertinent to this at all, and is an entirely new subject. Further than that, I desire to say that this matter was brought up before the committee. As a member of the District Committee, I have, ever since I have been a member of Congress, advocated the extension of the transfer privilege, until the transfer houses have been torn down and transfers are issued on all the cars, and all lines issue transfers to their own connecting lines in which they are interested, until we have in this city an elegant system of transfers.

Now, when this matter was brought before the District Committee there were two propositions. One was a franchise tax and another a universal transfer system. The committee decided to report the bill imposing the franchise tax, which made an additional tax of about $25,000 per year upon these various roads, and to postpone action on this amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan. Saying nothing about the point of order, I think it would be unjust to impose a franchise tax, which we have already done, and then in addition to ask for a universal transfer.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to say a word on the point of order.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. The tracks of the new company are at the end of the tracks of the Traction Company, are they not?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. CORLISS. Do they intersect or will they intersect any other street railway line now constructed except the line of the Traction Company?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. No other line now constructed.

Mr. CORLISS. No other line now constructed?

Mr. BABCOCK. No.

Mr. CORLISS. Therefore, so far as this company are concerned, they would not have to exchange any tickets, and the only exchange that would be authorized by my amendment would be imposed upon the old Traction Company, which has the best thoroughfares in the city of Washington.

Mr. BABCOCK. It would be imposed upon all companies, would it not?

Mr. CORLISS. Not at all. My amendment is evidently not understood by the gentleman. My amendment only applies to the two companies here for which we are legislating. It has no effect upon the other companies in the city.

Mr. HULL. It compels these companies to give transfers to the others, on all lines they cross.

Mr. CORLISS. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. Does it compel the other companies to give transfers on these lines?

Mr. CORLISS. You will probably have to follow this up with additional legislation.

Mr. HULL. Then this would entail a burden upon these companies which it does not entail on the lines which they cross?

Mr. CORLISS. It would probably do that temporarily; but I insist that when the other companies understood that Congress intends to compel them to give transfers, they would do so at once. There is no reason why they should not immediately do so. My amendment provides for an exchange with other companies.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the gentleman who made the point of order what the point of order is?

Mr. BABCOCK. I made the statement as clearly as I could that this is entirely a new matter which has no reference to the subject under consideration in this charter bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. That it is not germane?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; that it is not germane to the subject at all.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand this amendment is offered to section 19. Section 19 says:

Provided, That the said company and the Capital Traction Company are hereby required to issue free transfers, whereby a passenger on the said East Washington Heights Traction Company shall be entitled to a continuous ride over the line of the other company, or vice versa.

Now, then, that is the proposition of the bill. The amendment which is offered is entirely and absolutely germane. It says:

Provided further, That universal free transfers shall be issued and exchanged by said company and said Capital Traction Company with all street railways whose lines intersect the lines of said companies, so that a passenger shall be entitled to a continuous ride over the line of said companies and any line intersecting the same for one fare.

If you can hang a point of order on this situation, I should like to know how it is to be done.

Mr. BABCOCK. The intersecting lines and the Capital Traction Company cover the whole city. This is entirely new matter.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not discussing the propriety of the amendment, because I do not know anything about it. It may be unwise to adopt it, for aught I know. We have had no argument upon that question; but the amendment is clearly germane to the paragraph. The Chair surely can not find any reason for sustaining the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a ruling, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is a bill to incorporate the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company in the District of Columbia. Section 19 provides for the rates of fare upon that road, and also further provides:

That the said company—

That is, the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company—and the Capital Traction Company are hereby required to issue free transfers, whereby a passenger on the said East Washington Heights Traction Company shall be entitled to a continuous ride over the line of the other company, and vice versa.

That is, that these two companies can and must issue transfers one over the line of the other.

Now, this amendment provides that whatever railroads intersect with either of these two roads must issue transfers upon these two roads, and these two roads upon the others, for a continuous ride. Now, with all deference to what has been said, the Chair thinks that this is not germane to the proposition in the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. The proposition of the bill is that two companies shall issue free transfers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. These two companies.

Mr. DOCKERY. The proposition of the amendment is that other companies shall also be required to issue free transfers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is not germane to the language of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. The amendment is not offered to the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly not.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is offered to section 19. Section 19 provides that the two roads shall issue free transfers. The amendment proposes to enlarge the privileges given by section 19 and to take in other lines.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes; but it compels all other lines intersecting either of these to issue free transfers. It goes much further than the bill. The Chair holds that this is not germane, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let us beat the bill, then.

Mr. DOCKERY. Out of deference to the Chair, I shall not appeal from the ruling, but shall move to recommit this bill to the committee.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 17, page 11, strike out the word "seasonable" and insert in lieu thereof the word "reasonable."

Mr. BABCOCK. That is a typographical error.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa and Mr. BABCOCK called for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is there a copy of the engrossed bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is not.

Mr. DOCKERY. But I will not make that point.

The bill was read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. One word, Mr. Speaker. I hope gentlemen will not object to the passage of this bill. We have already passed eight or ten bills providing for charters for railroads during this Congress, and there has been no effort up to this time, so far as I know, to change the general railroad policy of this city on any of those bills. Now why is it, at this last moment, on the charter of a little road running from the Eastern Branch or Anacostia River one or two miles up the hill to Overlook Inn, that there should be an undertaking to pass a general measure, by an amendment, in such a shape, as a provision upon this bill?

Now, for myself, I do not care anything about the passage of the bill, except occasionally I like to go out to Overlook Inn. It is a delightful place to go, and it costs from $3 to $5 to go—I mean the going. [Laughter.] The mere going costs that much. Now, I think we would have a good deal more to spend there if we could go there for a nickel and come back for a nickel. I therefore hope you will not tackle this little fish with that great amendment. I hope gentlemen will take some great measure to put such an amendment on and let this little bill go through.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to know something about this bill. If I understand properly, it is to charter a railroad from the Eastern Branch to Overlook Inn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is what it is.

Mr. CANNON. Does anybody furnish the capital to build it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Some gentlemen came here and satisfied the committee that they will do it. They say they have got the money to put in. I do not know whether they have or not; but it will enable the gentleman from Illinois to go to Overlook Inn at a street-car fare.

Mr. McMILLIN. Permit me to suggest to my friend from Illinois and my friend from Tennessee—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was not quite through answering the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McMILLIN. It was on that point. The company proposing to do this have already spent in improving the grounds leading to Overlook Inn enough to build ten such roads.

Mr. CANNON. Well, all I have got to say is, that the settlement in that direction is such that if they are looking to its being built up, they must look into the distant future for any returns. I do not know, perhaps, what the purpose of the parties doing all this is; but it seems to me if they are encouraged they must be drawing on hope largely.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope there will be no factious opposition to the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Tennessee says we ought not to take advantage of the fact that this little bill is pending in order to change the general railroad policy of the District of Columbia. The gentleman from Wisconsin has just boasted that the general railroad policy of the District of Columbia was an extension of the free-transfer system, and that he had done much in that direction himself. So that one answers the other.

Now, this railroad company comes in asking a privilege of the Congress of the United States, and before we grant that privilege we ought to make them do this equity toward the people; and if we are to take advantage of the bill, if the gentleman from Tennessee is right, and we are starting a new precedent, then it is a precedent well worth being started and followed; and if the gentleman from Wisconsin is right that it is mere pursuance of a precedent already established by him and a continuance of a policy of the authorship of which he boasts, of course it makes no difference to the general public and it makes no difference to the legislator how much it costs my friend from Tennessee to go to Overlook Inn, and it makes no difference how much more it costs him to stay there until he gets ready to come back. I think all that has very little to do with the matter; but it seems to me, when these people come in and ask a privilege, that we ought, on the other hand, to ask the privilege for the people of riding over the various railroads.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, just one word on the amendment which was recently ruled out and which I submit is not now before the House for discussion. In the opinion of many members of the committee the net fare of 5 cents, or 4½ cents, was not too great by law from the east end of Pennsylvania avenue to the District line, which about represents Overlook Inn; but we have provided in this bill what some of us believed was unjust to the company, considering the character of territory—a system of free transfers. I ask gentlemen to note that fact. Notwithstanding the great expense entailed upon this proposed company of building the road into that territory, we have provided that any citizen residing on the line of the Capital Traction Railroad might ride continuously over that line to the District line southeast, receiving a free transfer at the east end of Pennsylvania avenue over this proposed railroad.

The promoters of this line objected to that at first, and your committee assured the gentlemen that without that provision it would be impossible to grant this charter. Now, one word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois. This road can be built, and your committee are of the opinion that it will be built, by the incorporators of the company. They have appeared before this committee personally and by petition and by letter, representing that if Congress grants their charter, the road will be built. These gentlemen having expended upward of half a million in property and improvements along the proposed railroad is in itself a sufficient guaranty that the road will be constructed.

Mr. RIDGELY. Do you place a limit of time?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Certainly; the usual limitation of time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. How could this amendment affect this new road to decrease its income in any way or to impair its operation in any way? I can understand how it would affect the Capital Traction Company, but not this road.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. The Committee on the District of Columbia did have under consideration this very proposition, and—

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this discussion is on a matter that has been ruled out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that the discussion is upon an amendment which has been ruled out.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. We are discussing the bill itself and giving as a reason for the defeat of the bill the fact that we could not put this amendment upon it.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to further discuss the bill, and I am ready for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi) there were—ayes 85, nays 10.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER (having counted the House). One hundred and thirty-eight gentlemen are present; not a quorum. Under the rules the doors will be closed, the previous question will be considered as ordered, and the call of the House will be made. Those in favor the passage of the bill will, when their names are called, say "aye," and those opposed "no."

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 139, nays 39, answered "present" 11, not voting 166; as follows:

STEAM ENGINEERING, ETC., DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of House bill 9693, to regulate steam engineering and the inspection of stationary steam engines and boilers in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9693) to regulate steam engineering and the inspection of stationary steam engines and boilers in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall, within thirty days after the approval of this act, appoint a person skilled in the mechanism and operation of stationary steam engines and boilers, in said District, who shall be styled inspector of stationary steam engines and boilers of the District of Columbia, and who shall hold office for three years and until his successor shall have been appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the Commissioners. Before entering upon the duties of his office said inspector shall execute a bond to the District of Columbia in the penalty of $5,000, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of said office. The said inspector shall receive an annual salary of $2,000; and the office of assistant inspector of stationary steam engines and boilers is hereby created, the incumbent of which shall be also skilled in the mechanism and operation of stationary steam engines and boilers, and be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and paid an annual salary of $900.

SEC. 2. That the inspector of stationary steam engines and boilers shall be a person of good moral character, and it shall be his duty to inspect all such steam boilers within the District at least once in every twelve months, and to condemn such as he may deem unsafe.

SEC. 3. That said inspector during his annual inspection shall make thorough examinations of all stationary boilers, and by proper and approved methods determine the amount of steam pressure per square inch at which they can safely be operated, and he shall also examine the feed pumps, gauges, cocks, and valves connected therewith, and by actual tests determine whether they are in proper working condition. A fee of $5 shall be paid by the owner, lessee, or proprietor of each boiler inspected, to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, whereupon said inspector shall issue a certificate stating the amount of pressure per square inch the said boiler or boilers are allowed to carry. These certificates must be displayed in conspicuous places in the establishments where such boilers are used. The inspector shall keep a record of each boiler inspected, with the name of the owner or owners, and the amount of pressure per square inch which said boiler is allowed to carry, and shall transmit to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia annually a copy of said record, together with a statement of the number and location of boilers inspected and condemned by him.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to use a steam boiler before it has been inspected or after it has been condemned without having such boiler made safe, or to work any steam boiler at a pressure per square inch greater than that prescribed in the certificate of the inspector, or while the feed pumps, cocks, gauges, or valves of the same are not in proper working condition.

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any person to take charge or control of any stationary steam engine, steam boiler, steam pump, elevator plant, or any apparatus for generating steam without having a license to do so as provided in this act, which license must be exposed to view in a conspicuous place in the room or place containing the boiler, generator, or engine of which such person is in charge; and it shall also be unlawful for steam engineers of class 3 to operate steam boilers of a greater capacity than 25 horsepower, and it will be unlawful for steam engineers of class 2 to operate plants of greater capacity than 75 horsepower. All licenses heretofore issued shall continue in force until the holders thereof shall have been reexamined.

SEC. 6. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, partnership or association, company or corporation to employ or keep in their employ for the purpose of taking charge or control of any stationary steam engine, steam boiler, or other apparatus for generating steam, any stationary steam engineer or other person who has not been licensed as provided and required by this act: Provided, however, That boilers used for steam heating, where the water returns to the boiler without the use of a pump, inspirator, or injector, and which are worked automatically, shall be exempt from the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That licenses to operate steam engines and boilers in the District of Columbia shall be issued in three classes. Those issued under class 1 shall authorize the holders thereof to operate steam plants of unlimited capacity. Those issued under class 2 shall limit the holder to operation of plants not exceeding in capacity 75 horsepower. Those issued under class 3 shall limit the holders to the operation of plants not exceeding 25 horsepower.

SEC. 8. That all persons applying for such licenses shall be examined by a board of examiners composed of the inspector of stationary steam engines and boilers of the District of Columbia and two practical stationary steam engineers to be designated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Said examinations shall be conducted under such regulations as the said Commissioners shall from time to time prescribe. The members of said board of examiners, with the exception of the inspector of stationary steam engines and boilers, shall receive compensation for their services at the rate of $300 per annum.

SEC. 9. That in order to be qualified to be examined for or to receive a license as steam engineer, the applicant must be a citizen of the United States, and shall not be under the age of 21 years. He must, on his first application for examination, fill out in his own handwriting a blank form of application prepared and prescribed by the board of examiners. This application shall contain the full name, age, and place of residence of the applicant, the place or places where he is or has been employed, and the nature of his employment for three years prior to the date of his application, and a statement that he is a citizen of the United States. The application must also contain a certificate signed by three reputable citizens of the District of Columbia, certifying that the statements made in said application are true.

SEC. 10. That after an engineer has worked one year under a license of the second or third class he may be again examined by the board of examiners, and if found competent to operate a steam plant of the next higher grade the said board may issue to him a license for that class. If it shall appear to the satisfaction of the board of examiners that an applicant for transfer lacks skill, is a person of bad habits, or is addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors, he shall not be transferred, and shall not be reexamined for the same until the expiration of one year.

SEC. 11. That whenever a stationary steam engineer shall accept or resign charge of a steam engine or boiler in the District of Columbia he shall notify the secretary of the board of examiners of steam engineers to that effect, not later than twenty-four hours after such event, giving the name of his new employer and new location and the horsepower of the plant under his charge.

SEC. 12. That any licensed stationary steam engineer in the District of Columbia who shall be found under the influence of intoxicating liquors while on duty shall, for the first offense, have his license suspended for one year, and for a second offense he shall be forever debarred from engaging in the business of a stationary steam engineer in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 13. That members of the board of examiners of stationary steam engineers, upon exhibiting their badges, shall have the right to enter any building or premises containing apparatus for generating steam power. The secretary of said board is hereby authorized to administer oaths in the performance of his duties as such.

SEC. 14. That any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall be prosecuted in the police court in the name of the District of Columbia, and, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $100, and in default of payment thereof be confined in the United States jail in the District of Columbia for a period of not less than sixty days.

SEC. 15. That a fee of $3 must be paid by all applicants for examination under these regulations.

SEC. 16. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 1, page 2, strike out the words "two thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "fifteen hundred."

Strike out the word "stationary," in line 21, all of lines 22 and 23, and the words "working at their trade," in line 24, and insert in lieu thereof the words "reputable citizens of the District of Columbia."

Strike out all of section 10 and change the numbers of sections 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 so that they shall be numbered 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16, respectively.

Mr. DOCKERY. This bill, Mr. Speaker, is on the House Calendar, but it should be on the Union Calendar, inasmuch as it makes a charge on the Treasury; but I am quite willing, as far as I am concerned, that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. It simply substitutes one plan for another.

Mr. DOCKERY. That makes no difference under the rule.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. It creates no new offices.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am quite willing it shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. I should like to ask how many offices the bill creates?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I will say that the present law governing this subject provides for an inspector of steam boilers at no salary whatever. It provides that he shall accept a fee for examining the boilers, in lieu of the salary, of $5 for each boiler, and out of this he pays his own expenses. Those fees for the last year amounted to about $3,000. There is also provided an examining board consisting of three members. These are on an entirely different basis, and are each paid $300 per annum.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does this bill change their salaries?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. No; it simply provides, in lieu of the present officers, one inspector, at a salary of $1,500 a year; one assistant inspector, at $900 a year, and two commissioners, who must be practical engineers, at a salary of $300 each, making a total of $3,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. In what part of the bill do you find the authority for the appointment of the commissioners?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. The authority for the appointment of the inspector and assistant inspector will be found in section 1. Then section 8 provides:

That all persons applying for such licenses shall be examined by a board of examiners composed of the inspector of stationary steam engines and boilers of the District of Columbia and two practical stationary steam engineers, to be designated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The salary of each of these engineers or commissioners will be $300 per annum.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does this bill repeal the law now providing for a board of three engineers at a salary of $300 each?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. It repeals that provision of the present law. I will say to the gentleman that the engineers of the District, through a competent committee, appeared before the Committee for the District of Columbia on two or three occasions to urge the passage of this bill. It has the unanimous support of the engineers of the District, I believe, and also of the Commissioners of the District.

Mr. DOCKERY. As I understand the theory of this bill, it proposes to create a board of examiners consisting of three members at a salary of $300 each.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. An inspector, who is to be one of the examiners, and two commissioners, will constitute the examining board.

Mr. DOCKERY. So that there will be a board consisting of two officers at a salary of $300 each and an inspector at a salary of $1,500?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. And then you have an assistant inspector at $900 a year?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. BABCOCK. Making a total of $3,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. The law now provides, I believe, for three engineers at a salary of $300 each.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. That is true; but I will say to my friend from Missouri that the revenues derived from the inspection of boilers are to be covered into the District treasury. Heretofore the inspector accepted the fees for inspection in lieu of salary.

Mr. BABCOCK. The receipts of fees will more than cover the expenses.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am in sympathy with the theory of this bill because it proposes to cover the fees into the treasury and make a specific appropriation for salaries. I think that is the correct business way of dealing with matters of this kind.

I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether the statute now creates these three officers at a salary of $300 each, or do they simply exist under the authority of the District appropriation bill?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I think the law provides for their appointment by the Commissioners.

Mr. COWHERD. As the statutes now stand they provide for the appointment of these officers by the Commissioners, but the $900 paid to the board is provided for in the District appropriation bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am inclined to think that this bill is a very decided improvement on the present system. But the District of Columbia appropriation bill has already passed the House and the Senate and is now pending in conference. The particular provision of that bill appropriating $900 for these three engineers is not in conference, having been agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. BABCOCK. Could not that matter be arranged by unanimous consent?

Mr. DOCKERY. Possibly it might.

While, as I have said, I think this bill a decided improvement over the existing law, I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether he has examined the bill sufficiently to be certain that all fees received for boiler inspection will be covered into the Treasury?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Yes, sir; the committee has framed the bill very carefully in that respect.

Mr. DOCKERY. We shall have to try to make some arrangement with reference to the appropriation for the board, for this bill does not carry an appropriation; and if it becomes a law, these salaries will have to be provided for in the deficiency bill.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I ask for a vote on the amendments of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COWHERD. There is a small amendment I desire to offer to correct what is probably a misprint. I move to strike out the word "less," in line 14, page 8, and insert "more." The bill now provides for a fine of "not more than $100" or imprisonment for "not less than sixty days." I think it should read "not more than sixty days."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am advised by the Committee on Military Affairs that they have one or two measures that are very important and that should be considered to-day. The Committee on the District of Columbia has still two bills that should be called up, and I will ask now unanimous consent that it may be in order to call up business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia next Wednesday.

Mr. DALZELL. There is a special order for Wednesday.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, Thursday.

Mr. SULZER. Just these two bills?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to know what the bills are that are to be called up from the Military Committee.

Mr. SULZER. I should like to ask what the bills are that are to be called up from the District Committee.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

BRIGHTWOOD RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10280) to require the Brightwood Railroad Company to abandon its overhead trolley on Kenyon street, between Seventh and Fourteenth streets.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Brightwood Avenue Railroad Company of the District of Columbia be, and it is hereby, required, within one month from the passage of this act, to vacate that part of its road lying on Kenyon and Marshall streets, between Seventh and Fourteenth streets, in said District, and remove its tracks and poles therefrom: Provided, however, That said company shall have the right at any time within three years from the passage of this act to equip and operate said road with underground electric power, such as is now used by the Metropolitan Railroad Company. In case said company shall neglect or refuse to equip said road as aforesaid within said period of three years, then their right to do so shall stand as forfeited and their charter repealed as to said part of said road: And provided further, That in case said railroad company shall refuse to remove its tracks and poles from said street within thirty days as aforesaid, then its charter to that part of said road shall stand forfeited and repealed from said date.

The Committee on the District of Columbia recommended the following amendments:

In title of bill strike out the word "Railroad" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Railway."

Page 1, line 3, strike out the words "Avenue Railroad" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Railway."

Page 1, line 9, strike out the words "three years" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one year."

Page 2, line 7, add the following:

"And after the expiration of said thirty days said Brightwood Railway Company shall be liable to a fine of $25 a day for each day its tracks, or any part thereof, or its poles, or any one of them, shall remain in said Kenyon or Marshall streets, said fine to be collected in any court of competent jurisdiction at the suit of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent, the title of the bill was amended so as to read as follows: "A bill to require the Brightwood Railway Company to abandon its overhead trolley on Kenyon street, between Seventh and Fourteenth streets."

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing further from the District Committee to-day.

STAFF APPOINTMENTS IN THE VOLUNTEER ARMY.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I again ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4621) to amend sections 10 and 13 of an act entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," approved April 22, 1898.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," approved April 22, 1898, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following, to-wit: "And provided, That officers of the Regular Army shall be eligible for such staff appointments, and shall not be held to vacate their offices in the Regular Army by accepting the same, but shall be entitled to receive only the pay and allowances of their staff rank."

Sec. 2. That section 13 of said act is amended so as to read as follows:

"That the governor of any State or Territory may, with the consent of the President, appoint officers of the Regular Army in the grades of field officers in organizations of the Volunteer Army, and the President may appoint officers of the Regular Army in the grade of field officers in organizations of the Volunteer Army raised in the District of Columbia and the Indian Territory, and in the regiments possessing special qualifications, provided for in section 6 of an act of Congress approved April 22, 1898, and in section 2 of the act of Congress approved May 11, 1898; and officers thus appointed shall be entitled to retain their rank in the Regular Army: Provided, That not more than one officer of the Regular Army shall hold a commission in any one regiment of the Volunteer Army at the same time: And provided further, That officers so appointed shall be entitled to receive only the pay and allowances of their rank in the volunteer organization."

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox]?

Mr. HULL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, unless some time is granted, a short time for discussion—

Mr. HULL. I will grant time to the gentleman. I will yield to the gentleman such time as he thinks he may require to discuss the bill.

Mr. COX. I will not require much.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. If the time is yielded to me, I will make no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Iowa to state that he will yield whatever time the gentleman desires.

Mr. COX. Then I will make no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, before yielding to the gentleman, I want to call the attention of the House to a provision of the section to be amended. It is in section 10 of the volunteer act, which provides that—may be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as officers of the Volunteer Army, or may be assigned by him, in his discretion, from officers of the Regular Army or the Volunteer Army, or the militia in the service of the United States.

The staff officers herein authorized—

That is, applying to all of the staff officers for corps, division, and brigade commanders—

That provision did not contain the proviso which is in section 11 and section 13 of the bill which provided for commissioning officers of the Regular Army as brigadier-generals or in volunteer regiments, and providing further that they should retain their offices in the Regular Army while serving as volunteers. This has been called to the attention of the Military Committee by the Secretary of War in a letter transmitting the bill, both to the Senate and the House, on May 16. The Senate promptly passed the bill. Members may remember that in section 11 of the volunteer act the proviso was put in which provides for commissioning any officer of the Regular Army as a brigadier-general, and that any officer so selected and appointed from the Regular Army shall be entitled to retain his rank.

Section 13 provides for commissioning officers of the Regular Army by the governors of the States, with the consent of the President, as colonels or other field-officers of the volunteer regiments. The provision was put in that officers thus appointed shall be entitled to retain their rank in the Regular Army. This bill does not propose to change the law as to the appointment of the staff by the President of the United States in any particular, but does make it clear that an officer commissioned on the staff from the Regular Army shall retain his rank in the Regular Army and take it up again when his service on the volunteer staff shall cease.

Mr. TERRY. Right there I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Suppose a captain in the Regular Army is appointed a major or colonel of volunteers. Then does a first lieutenant in the Regular Army become a captain—

Mr. HULL. Not at all, because the officer appointed to volunteer rank does not vacate his office in the Regular Army. There is no vacancy created at all if we pass this amendment.

Mr. TERRY. What does the company in the Regular Army do for a captain?

Mr. HULL. Get along with the officers remaining.

Mr. TERRY. I wanted to see if the effect of the bill was what I have indicated.

Mr. HULL. Where the appointment is from the line, if a captain is appointed to a staff office on the volunteer corps, his office as captain is not made vacant, but it is the same as if he should be assigned or detailed now. An appointment which creates no vacancy makes no chance for promotion or for an additional officer in the Regular Army.

Mr. TERRY. I just wanted to ascertain if the bill would affect the kind of a case that I have referred to. I know of several instances of that kind—

Mr. HULL. It will not.

Mr. TERRY. Where captains and first lieutenants have been appointed majors and colonels.

Mr. HULL. It will not affect them.

Mr. TERRY. It would not affect that kind of a case?

Mr. HULL. No, sir.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Is it not a fact that this bill is to meet a rather technical objection raised by the Comptroller of the Treasury to the existing law?

Mr. HULL. Whether it is technical or not, it is a fact that the Comptroller of the Treasury holds that the law which provides that—

No person who holds an office the salary or annual compensation attached to which amounts to the sum of $2,500 shall be appointed to hold any other office to which compensation is attached, unless specially heretofore or specially hereafter authorized thereto by law—

vacates the office in the Regular Army, and these officers of the Regular Army who have been appointed will not accept their appointments unless they are protected in their rights the same as other officers.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does not the gentleman think the wording of the bill which states that the commission of the officer detailed to the Volunteer Army shall not be vacated covers completely the objection of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY]? The commission not having been vacated, no one can be appointed to fill the vacancy, and therefore no promotion can be made.

Mr. HULL. That is very clear. It makes no vacancies.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HULL. Let us hear from our friend from Tennessee [Mr. Cox]. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee want?

Mr. COX. Well, I want a reasonable time. That was granted to me by the agreement.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman stated to me that he thought ten minutes would be enough.

Mr. COX. I shall not take an unreasonable time. It was agreed that I should have a reasonable time.

Mr. HULL. I will suggest to the gentleman that some definite time should be yielded, even if the gentleman does not wish to use it all. I myself have not an unlimited time.

Mr. COX. I made the request that I should have a reasonable time, and the gentleman agreed to that.

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman ten minutes, and if that is not sufficient I will yield to him more.

Mr. COX. Well, I am not limited by the gentleman under the agreement in this matter.

Mr. HULL. I think my friend is unreasonable in that, because he stated to me that ten minutes would be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the gentleman was to have "a reasonable time."

Mr. COX. Whenever the Speaker thinks it is unreasonable I will be glad to sit down [laughter]; but I will not submit to the chairman of the committee in that respect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized. Mr. COX. For a reasonable time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the only desire I have in the world is to get this question squarely and fairly before the House. I am not disposed in the least to antagonize any of these questions that are called emergency measures, notwithstanding the emergency has got to be a little too emergent, in my conclusion about matters. It is emergent a little too much. Now, what is the proposition here? I have fought in that committee from the commencement of this war, and I have continued to do so up to the present, for the rights of the volunteers called out by the President.

I announced my convictions this way—that if you want an effective force of volunteers, let them select their officers, in whom they have confidence. I supposed the governors of the States, upon the recommendation of the men who had to do the fighting, would respect their wishes in regard to the matter. I adhered to that rule all through this contest, and I still adhere to it. In that I have not any antagonism against the Army, not that I fear the Army will not do its duty; but I know, and every man who has ever had any experience about it knows, that you can not fight volunteers under Regular Army officers like you can fight them under officers of their own selection, from their own homes, and their own surroundings.

Now, let me say that it grows out of this order of things: In a company you have in the captain and lieutenant, and even down to the sergeants and the corporals, men who have associations with their fellow-men, who have been gathered up about their own homes; so that they are not only responsible for doing their duty upon the field in their official capacity, but responsible at home for the way that they treat their men. I have known before, and believe to-day, that the best fighting force that ever marched in this country was when the men were led by their own neighbors, men selected by the soldiers who did the shooting. [Applause.]

I have never had any idea that any governor of a State would ignore the recommendations of the men who volunteered in the selection of their officers from their friends and their neighbors whom they chose to lead and control them. Now, here is the proposition: The volunteer bill, that was passed after a considerable contest, when it first reached the Committee on Military Affairs, before calling out the volunteers of the United States, made two propositions that were unknown before in this country. One of these was that the President of the United States had a right to call for volunteers from one State or two States or any State that he saw proper.

That was combated and destroyed in the committee. Not only that, but it provided that every commissioned officer in the volunteer service should be appointed by the President. That was combated and destroyed; and eventually in that bill we agreed, and that passed the House and the Senate, that when we come to the field officers, known as the colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and the major, then, upon the recommendation of the governor, an army officer might be selected—one to a regiment—but it was based upon the recommendation of the governor. That is the proposition that is in the bill and was submitted to.

Now, then, we come to the staff officers—and that is what this bill proposes. What did we do in the volunteer bill? What was it proposed that we should agree to? Here was a conflict again. Of course a brigadier-general could not be selected by a governor. That was too plain to be considered. The brigades might be made up of regiments from different States. So we left that to the President; but when we came to pass upon the State officers in the volunteer bill, what did we fix and what did we provide?

The staff officers herein authorized for the corps, division, and brigade commanders may be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as officers of the Volunteer Army.

Where do they come from? They come from volunteers—the men that volunteered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Is there anything in the bill that specifies that?

Mr. COX. Wait a minute; just be right quiet and you will have no trouble to understand. The staff was provided for in the tenth section. Now, here is what followed:

Or may be assigned by him, in his discretion, from officers of the Regular Army or the Volunteer Army, or of the militia in the service of the United States.

Now, here were two classes that were to be appointed from. Officers of the Regular Army or officers of the volunteer service we authorized him to appoint from; and then we authorized him to assign others. Who could he assign? Gentlemen, let not the words escape you, for we will see what is meant as we go on with the argument. He might assign from officers of the Regular Army, or he might assign from the volunteer service when these officers are selected, or he might assign from the militia of the States for these volunteers. Now, there were the two classes. Not "selected" or "appointed" from the the Regular Army, but assigned.

Now, what is the proposition? That is the volunteer bill. Now, let us read what this bill proposes to do. Before I leave that point allow me to suggest that it was plain and good, in my judgment, that if the President of the United States desired to assign an officer—not appoint him, but assign him—to a volunteer service, there could be no serious objection to it. But he could not appoint, and the volunteer bill absolutely cut it off and for the best reason in the world. We provided that he might assign officers from the Regular Army; and when he assigned a field officer, he had to confine himself to the recommendation of the governor of that State. That is what that volunteer bill provided. Now, what does your amendment propose to do? The proviso is all there is in it:

And officers of the Regular Army shall be eligible for such staff appointments, and shall not be held to vacate their offices in the Regular Army by accepting the same, but shall be entitled to receive only the pay and allowances of their staff rank.

Now, I believe in making plain the language; and if gentlemen disagree with me, that is all right. Here is a captain in the Regular Army, and the President of the United States, if this law is passed, appoints him—mark the words, "appoints him"—to a colonelcy of volunteers, and he takes his place. Now, then, he is a colonel of volunteers. There is a captain's place in the Regular Army with nobody to fill it, and yet that man goes into the service of the volunteers with the rank of colonel.

Mr. McCLELLAN. At the request of the governor of the State.

Mr. COX. Oh, no. The gentleman has got his head all wrong. [Laughter.] That is a field officer.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Is not the colonel of a regiment a field officer?

Mr. COX. Can not a colonel be a staff officer? I am speaking of staff officers. I will put it a major.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It is the same with the major. There is a difference between staff officers and line officers.

Mr. COX. I heard something about that forty years ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCLELLAN. The gentleman seems to have forgotten it.

Mr. COX. Well, I am talking about staff officers. I will not take a colonel for it seems to bother my friend from New York. I will take a captain in the Regular Army, and he is appointed by the President of the United States as a major of volunteers. Now, during the war he is ranked as a major; he draws the pay of a major. When the war ceases he goes back to his rank of captain in the Regular Army; to that I do not object. But here is the difficulty: You confer upon the President power under this bill to appoint all the staff officers from the Regular Army when the volunteer bill confines it alone to the field officers. That is the trouble.

Mr. OGDEN. When all the captains and lieutenants in the Regular Army are appointed to be majors, etc., who commands the companies in the Regular Army?

Mr. COX. I understand this bill and I will answer the question of my friend, which is a very sensible one.

Mr. OGDEN. That is all right; I am with you, Colonel, on this bill, and I want to know who will command these companies when their officers are taken away from them?

Mr. COX. You ask the President who will command them. I do not know. Here is a captain who has been appointed as a major of volunteers on a staff, and there is his company in the Regular Army left without a captain; and if he takes the first lieutenant of that company and makes him a lieutenant or a captain of volunteers, who fills his place as lieutenant?

A MEMBER. The second lieutenant.

Mr. COX. Then comes the second lieutenant, and then the sergeant is made a lieutenant, and while you do not create any new officers under this bill, you fill up the line of promotion from the bottom in the Regular Army. That is what this bill means.

Mr. BURKE. To the detriment of the volunteers.

Mr. COX. Yes; where are your volunteers? Every time you take a captain from the Regular Army and put him upon the staff, to that extent you displace the chances of the volunteer.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does not the same objection hold good in taking a general officer from the Regular Army?

Mr. HAY. Does not the same objection you have made apply to the Volunteer Army as well as to the Regular Army? If you take all the staff from the Volunteer Army, who is going to command the companies and their regiments?

Mr. COX. The volunteers. Now let me put this case: Here is a brigadier-general selected and put over a regiment from Texas and a regiment from Louisiana that make up the brigade. The President of the United States selects the brigadier-general; he puts him into the field in command of that brigade. Now, there are the boys in line from Louisiana and Texas, and instead of putting over them the officers of their selection whom they know and have been training with, he sends to West Point and puts upon the staff a captain of the Regular Army. Do you think the volunteers will appreciate that?

Mr. McCLELLAN. But you take a colonel from the Regular Army and make him a brigadier-general of volunteers, thus depriving the regulars of a colonel.

Mr. COX. Then all the other officers will be promoted.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Do you not object to that as much as to the staff assignment?

Mr. COX. Of course, the cases are totally different. Now let me follow out the suggestion of my friend from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN]. You take a colonel of the Regular Army and make him a brigadier-general and assign him to a command of volunteer troops. What do you do then in the Regular Army? You promote your lieutenant-colonel; you promote your major; you promote your senior captain; and so you go on down the line. That is the way the vacancies are filled.

Now, suppose you take a captain from the Regular Army and put him in command of volunteers, or, more properly speaking, on the staff. What do you do then?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Promote your first lieutenant.

Mr. COX. So you do in this case.

Mr. McCLELLAN. You temporarily put the first lieutenant in command of the company; you do not promote him.

Mr. COX. You take your captain and make him a major of volunteers.

Mr. McCLELLAN. An acting major.

Mr. COX. Oh, let us not quibble about words.

Mr. McCLELLAN. There is a difference between a major and an acting major.

Mr. COX. I will come to that point in a moment. You take your captain out of the Regular Army and make him a major of volunteers. Now, you necessarily promote the officers of that company to fill the different places. If you did not, your Regular Army would be disorganized.

Now, stop and think a moment. Here is an acting major. He is not an acting major under this bill; he is a regularly commissioned major.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Oh, no.

Mr. COX. Why, that is what the bill is for.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Oh, no.

Mr. COX. I am sure, with all respect to my friend, that he has not studied the bill carefully.

Now, here is a man with a commission as major of volunteers, and at the same time he is a captain in the Regular Army, for he has not lost his place there. Thus you have a man who is holding two offices.

Mr. RIDGELY. Which salary does he draw?

Mr. COX. He draws salary as a major of volunteers.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. If I understand my friend, he claims that this bill will change the law so that officers now recommended by the governors will be appointed solely by the President, without such recommendation.

Mr. COX. I will make it plain what this bill means. Under the volunteer bill no field officer could be appointed except upon the recommendation of the governor. That is not a staff office at all. But now you propose to go a step further and authorize the President to appoint all the staff officers out of the Regular Army.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Without the recommendation of the governor?

Mr. COX. The governor has no more to do with it than you have.

Mr. BLAND. Can the governor make such recommendation now? Does this bill change the law in that respect?

Mr. COX. Certainly. Under the present law the governor can recommend the appointment of a field officer from the Regular Army; but this bill authorizes appointments from the Regular Army, regardless of the recommendation of the governor, upon the staff.

Mr. BLAND. Then the gentleman holds that this does change the existing law?

Mr. COX. Beyond a doubt; and that is the ground of my opposition.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. COX. With pleasure.

Mr. HAY. Is it not a fact that under one of the sections of what is known as the Volunteer Army bill the governor of any of the States can appoint one field officer himself? Is not that true?

Mr. COX. You have not stated the matter quite correctly.

Mr. HAY. Well, he can make the appointment from the Regular Army.

Mr. COX. The President can appoint one field officer—
A MEMBER. Assign him.
Mr. COX. From the Regular Army upon the recommendation of the governor.
Mr. HAY. Now, I ask my friend, does this bill change the law in that respect?

Mr. COX. Not as to the field officer.

Mr. HAY. Very well; that answers the question of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. COX. No; it does not.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Missouri asked the gentleman from Tennessee whether this bill changed the law in regard to staff officers. Now, I would like my friend from Tennessee to read any section of the Volunteer Army bill which provides that staff officers shall be recommended by the governors of States.

Mr. COX. It does not so provide.

Mr. HAY. Very well; then this does not repeal the law; and that answers the question of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BLAND. Now, if my friend—

Mr. COX. Wait a moment. I yielded to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] for a question; but I have to answer an argument, and it will not take me long to do it.

I ask gentlemen to keep in mind the difference between a staff officer and a field officer. They are totally different. Field officers, in common acceptance of military law, are the brigadier-general, the colonel, the lieutenant-colonel, the major. But here is what the Volunteer Army bill said about the staff officers:

The staff officers herein authorized for the corps, division, and brigade commanders may be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as officers of the Volunteer Army.

If this provision stopped there, it would cover the whole case; it would go into the whole field of appointment. But he may "assign," in his discretion, from officers in the Regular Army, or he may assign from the Volunteer Army, or he may assign from the militia of the different States. Do you see the distinction made? It is as plain as it can be written. He may "appoint" in the Volunteer Army a certain set of staff officers, not from the Regular Army, but from civilians. Then he may "assign" from the Regular Army certain officers of the Regular Army. What does "assign" mean? Why, simply transferring from one duty to another. That is all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that "a reasonable time" has been occupied. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. For the first time in my life I have to dissent from the ruling of the Chair on time. I think it will take five minutes more to make it reasonable. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for five minutes more.

Mr. COX. I am very much obliged to the Chair, and I will not go beyond the five minutes.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee—

The SPEAKER. The Chair grants the five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I will yield enough of my time to the gentleman from Kansas to allow him to ask a question.

Mr. SIMPSON. I want to ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, there is anything in this bill which will interfere with the promotion of such eminent generals and strategists as young General Blaine and young General Alger, and Astor and others?

Mr. COX. The gentleman has investigated that more than I have and he can answer it better than I can.

Now, in conclusion, permit me to say, if in the judgment of this House it does not interfere with the volunteer officers, I have no objection; but I see and you will see upon investigation that when you take these officers from the Regular Army and they hold their commissions in the Regular Army, though they may be colonels or lieutenant-colonels in the Volunteer Army, when the war is over they will still be majors and captains, and I think you will find a lot of promotions in the Regular Army that will make a surplus of officers that we shall have to dispose of after we reach them.

However, you may decide it. That is my judgment. I shall be content with your decision. I felt it my duty to bring these points before the House, for, much as I esteem the Regular Army, I will not, as far as I can help it, permit them to put their feet on the volunteers. [Applause.]

Mr. OGDEN. They are doing that right straight along.

Mr. COX. I am trying to prevent that.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the first section. If it provokes any discussion, I want the privilege of withdrawing it. I do it for the reason that in the organization of the Engineer Corps we provided for the appointment of three officers of the Regular Army to each regiment, but made no provision that they should retain their rank in the Regular Army, and they decline to accept commissions until that is fixed up. It is the same trouble we have had in regard to the staff.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 1 the following:

"Provided further, That officers of the Regular Army receiving commissions in regiments of engineers, or any other commissions in the Volunteer Army, shall not be held to vacate their offices in the Regular Army by accepting the same, but shall be entitled to receive only the pay and allowances of the volunteer rank while serving as such."

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will just put in two words there we will settle this question. Let him provide there that they shall be appointed as provided by the volunteer bill. Then we shall have no trouble.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, that goes without saying, that they can not be appointed in any other way except under the volunteer bill.

Mr. COX. Then there is no harm in saying it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would be glad if the gentleman would have that amendment reported again.

Mr. HULL. I have no objection to reporting it again.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] a question. As I understand it, this does not relate to the appointment of these officers at all, but merely enables them, having been appointed as already provided for, to hold their rank in the Regular Army, so that when the war is over and the volunteer forces are disbanded, they can go back to their old positions.

Mr. HULL. That is the entire purpose of the act; but I will say to my friend that in the staff matters the word "assign" was used in place of "appoint," and the President did appoint and the Senate confirmed; but there was no provision that they should retain their rank in the Regular Army, and all the staff appointments made in that way are now held up. This makes no additional office, gives no additional authority, but simply makes clear what we had supposed was clear before.

The amendment of Mr. HULL was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

WAR REVENUE BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 10100.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY] to the amendment of the committee numbered 177.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment by inserting after the word "shareholders," in line 21, on page 62:

Limited liability commercial partnerships, or corporations, and companies or corporations of limited liability conducting planting or farming business, or preparing for market products of the soil.

Mr. McENERY. I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if the amendment is calculated to exempt the sugar corporations from taxation. I am in hearty sympathy with its general purpose, as I gather it, but I do not think the large sugar corporations should be exempt from a reasonable tax. I am inclined to believe that the language is broad enough to make such an exemption.

Mr. DANIEL. I would beg to inquire of the author of the amendment what is meant by "corporations of limited liability?"

Mr. McENERY. It exempts sugar estates just as any other farming interests are exempted. There are in Louisiana certain sugar plantations owned by several parties where the planting business is carried on and sugar is produced and prepared for market on plantations conducted under limited liability corporations. The same applies to cotton plantations. It would be unjust to tax one plantation conducted under a limited liability corporation, doing exactly the same business that is done by another, and exempt the latter. The only reason why they adopt the corporate form is in order to prevent the cessation of the business by the death of one of the partners, so that the business can be conducted and continuously operated. The same rule applies as to commercial partnerships. We all know that those limited corporations are organized for the purpose of convenience in the settlement of estates. Where a man in a commercial partnership organized as a corporation dies it is continued and the interest of the partner is kept alive.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg to ask the Senator from Louisiana what is meant by a "corporation of limited liability?"

Mr. McENERY. It limits the liability of the members of the corporation or company to the amount that is invested in the concern.

Mr. DANIEL. It seems to me that the feature of a corporation of limited liability under the interpretation the Senator from Louisiana gives to the matter would exist in all corporations. But there is a limit to exemptions sought in his contemplated amendment by the nature of the occupation that the corporations are engaged in. They are those "conducting planting or farming business, or preparing for market products of the soil."

It appears to me that the provisions of the bill have gone as far for protecting agriculture as it ought to go in justice to other occupations, for it has provided an exemption for those corporations which buy and sell raw or unmanufactured domestic agricultural products. There was a certain equity in that provision in view of the fact that in the very nature of the case, whatever might be the desire of lawmakers, the agricultural products of this country can not share in the benefits of a protective tariff. They are obliged to find their market in foreign countries, and the price here is largely regulated by the prices which they must find there in competition with the pauper labor of other countries of which we have heard so much. As they can not share in any degree of protection which is granted by the customs tax, it was thought that those who were dealing with the mere raw product might perhaps properly be exempt.

For myself, Mr. President, I think that the whole policy of exemption is a bad one. I think equality before the law is the great principle that should be followed. When we commence to exempt, it is almost impossible to tell where to draw a line that would be equitable. However that may be, it seems to me, sir, that the bill as it stands has gone as far as is reasonable and proper.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I think that the bill has gone a good deal further than is reasonable and proper. My judgment is that this section imposing a tax upon corporations ought to be entitled "A bill for the encouragement of enlistments in the United States Army," for I fully believe that if it becomes a law there will be a million men in the United States out of work or with wages so reduced that they would prefer service in the United States Army to service in manufacturing corporations.

Now, let me illustrate. Take the cotton manufacturers of New England. Their gross receipts are large. Their profits for four years, as a rule, have been nothing. I live in a cotton-manufacturing city, and I know whereof I affirm. I know that one of the largest and finest cotton factories in the United States of America has not paid a dividend for four years, and has simply been run for the purpose of keeping its employees in labor and not turning them out upon the public streets.

In my city those corporations are taxed by the municipality on an assessment larger than it would cost to replace the plant spindle by spindle to-day. Every dollar of the property is taxed by the municipality. Then the Commonwealth of Massachusetts provides by law that all stocks shall be taxed and compels returns to be made to the State. All the stocks in those mills in my State are owned in Boston, and there comes another tax upon the corporations, the full value of the stock. If you impose in these times the additional tax provided for by the bill on the gross receipts of those companies, they would inevitably shut down, or they would again reduce wages to the laborers, and that would be followed by terrible strikes, as it was followed by them six months ago. The weight, the burden, will fall upon the men and women who work in the mills, and not upon the stockholders of the mills.

Now, take another form of corporation—

Mr. DANIEL. Do not these corporations in the United States propose to pay anything to carry on the war proper? Has everything got to be put on the workingmen?

Mr. FRYE. If this tax is imposed, it will fall upon the workingmen, because the mills must either stop or else they must reduce wages. They did reduce wages, the Senator remembers, six months ago, and that was followed by terrible strikes all over New England. But the workmen were compelled to submit.

Mr. DANIEL. Does the Senator propose that corporations shall pay nothing to carry on the war?

Mr. FRYE. I am selecting certain corporations to illustrate what the effect of this tax will be.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the Senator what corporations he thinks should be taxed to carry on the war?

Mr. FRYE. I think very likely certain railroad corporations of the country could pay on the gross receipts. There are some in my own section of the country who could, while in other sections of the country they could not.

Mr. DANIEL. How can we discriminate between those who are badly off and those that are not any more than we can discriminate between individuals?

Mr. FRYE. By striking them all out, as they ought to be stricken out from this bill.

Mr. DANIEL. Do you propose to strike out the tax levied on poor people, too?

Mr. FRYE. I call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to another thing. I do not believe that Senators living in the South understand at all what a savings-bank corporation is in New England. I do not believe they appreciate the savings bank of New England. It is a purely benevolent institution. Not a share of stock is issued by any New England savings institution. They were inaugurated originally for the purpose of inspiring workingmen with a spirit of saving. The directors were selected from men in the vicinity, of high character for integrity and sagacity in business, so that the workingmen might have confidence in them. The result has turned out to be what was expected. Those workingmen are saving their money. It is in those banks, and every single dollar that is earned in those banks is paid out to the depositors who put the money in them, barring a small salary paid to the cashier.

There is not a director in New England who receives a cent for his service. There are very few presidents in New England who receive any salary whatever. Taking the largest corporation in my city, the Androscoggin Savings Bank, the entire salaries in that immense bank will not amount to $3,000 a year. Every single dollar that is made goes to the depositors, and nearly all of the depositors are men and women who work in our mills.

Why should this bill impose a tax upon those depositors? They do not get more than 3 or 4 per cent a year for their money. When they save a little money, they buy a lot of land and undertake to build a house. Then the bank turns around and loans at a low rate of interest the money with which to build that house.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the State tax those corporations?

Mr. FRYE. The State taxes those corporations to a very small extent.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Maine kindly tell us some of the industries or sources of wealth which he thinks should be taxed?

Mr. FRYE. I am not talking about what should be taxed; I am talking about what should not be taxed. I want to call the Senator's attention to another thing.

Take the transportation companies on the water. Anyone who knows anything about the rate of transportation for freight on the water to-day knows that it is at the very lowest possible figure, and that no vessel to-day can engage in the transportation of freight unless she be of 1,500 tons burden and upward; that your small vessels can not carry at a profit at all, and that they are dividing no profits. You may take the entire lake transportation service to-day and the small vessels are paying no dividends to their stockholders. I do not believe a company can be found that is. The vessels are from 2,000 tons up to 6,000 tons, and by carrying immense freights they manage to save a little money. If you impose this tax upon those transportation companies, either those freights must go up or else those corporations must stop running their ships.

Now, take another thing. I had a letter yesterday from a distinguished gentleman in Portland, Me. He is a man of sense, too, for his postscript is, "This calls for no reply." I wish I could see that oftener in my letters nowadays. This is in relation to mutual insurance companies, and the writer says:

1. In all cases other than those of life-insurance policies the amount of the stamp is based upon value, except when a small stamp is used for all values. The stamp on policies is based upon the amount of the policy instead of its value, and the result is that the tax on them is a many times greater per cent of the value than the tax upon any other instrument.

2. Again, in the case of purely mutual companies like the Union Mutual—

That is a company in my State—

the tax comes not upon the company, but upon the policy holders, the vast majority of whom are poor and having all they can do to live and pay their premiums. Such companies use all their profits in the reduction of premiums. There are, of course, stock companies in which a part of the profits is paid in dividends—and sometimes very large ones—to the stockholders, but in purely mutual companies what are called profits, but what in reality are only the difference between the estimated cost of insurance and the actual cost, are returned to the policy holders.

So that, taking the high price of the stamp and the financial ability of the policy holders together, this bill imposes the highest, and very much the highest, tax upon the class in the community least able to pay it. The tax is actually from 3 to 5 per cent of the value of the policy to the holder, according to the age at which it is taken out, and highest on the younger men.

Mr. President, I did not desire to detain the Senate. I simply say that in my judgment this section is a section to encourage enlistments in the United States Army.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, if I did not consider that the feature of the bill now under consideration was so unnecessary, so unjust, and indeed so unconstitutional, I would not occupy the time of the Senate for a moment in discussing it, and I shall not attempt any elaborate discussion of it now.

I regret, Mr. President, that there is to be any division in the Senate upon a measure of this kind. I regret that there is to be any division between the Senate and the House of Representatives upon a measure of this kind. I regret that the passage of this bill, which is necessary to arm the Government with financial strength to meet the emergency and carry on the war, should be delayed by discussion.

I said that in my opinion this feature of the bill, this tax upon corporations, was unnecessary, unjust, unconstitutional. It is unnecessary because the bill will raise revenue enough without it. All the revenue that we ought to raise during the next fiscal year will be secured by the bill if this amendment shall be eliminated.

I listened to remarks made by Senators yesterday which seemed to imply that no matter how great the necessities of the Government might be, no matter how great the expenditures, ordinary and extraordinary, of the war might be, under no circumstances was it justifiable to issue interest-bearing bonds; that the whole expenses should be met either by taxation upon the people and the business of the country or by the issue of paper money.

I do not stop to discuss that feature of the bill this morning, but merely to say that I think it entirely proper when we are in war, when the expenditures of the Government are abnormally swelled, to distribute the burden of war and the carrying it on over a period of years. I have never heard until the present discussion in the Senate of any other method of carrying on a war. Additional taxes, to be sure, but not such as to be unduly burdensome upon the people and business of the country; then a resort to credit.

Mr. President, as the bill came from the House I believe it would raise all the money by taxation that the people and business of the present ought to bear. I believe that when we levy and collect, in addition to the regular revenues of the country, $100,000,000 in one year from the people and from the business and occupations of the country, that is quite enough to burden the people and the business of the country with.

I would have been quite content to have rested there. I think that the bill as it came from the House would have raised much more revenue than was estimated by the committee that framed it. I believe that instead of yielding $100,000,000 of revenue for the next fiscal year it would have yielded from $115,000,000 to $120,000,000. I believe that the extreme caution of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means made him underestimate the amount of money which was to be raised by the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. Indeed, some other members of the committee aside from the chairman gave their individual estimate in speeches that it would raise from $110,000,000 to $115,000,000.

I do not believe that any of us know how great has been the increase in those industries and in the business which is subject to taxation in this bill. The check stamp tax in 1864-65 and at that period yielded only $2,500,000. I believe that that tax itself will raise three times the amount now that it did then. I shall be very much surprised if it does not raise four times the amount that it did then. I believe there are four times as many checks drawn now as then. I think that is a safe estimate and within the probabilities; and that holds true with reference to every article subject to the stamp tax. So I believe that the bill as it came from the House would have raised all the money that the people of this country should be required to pay during the next year in addition to the burdens which are imposed upon them by ordinary taxation.

I think that the term of the bonds proposed by the House was eminently fair. If we can distribute the burdens of this war over ten years, that seems to me to be a fair proposition. We ought not to put it all on one year or two years or three years. Ten years is a fair period over which to distribute the burdens.

But, Mr. President, the bill as reported by the Finance Committee of the Senate before we reached the clause which is now under discussion, called the corporation tax, has added very greatly to the amount which would have been derived from it as it came from the House. I think that the estimate which the Senator from Iowa in charge of the bill made in his opening statement, that it would yield $115,000,000 at least before we come to this corporation tax, far within the probabilities of the case. As to one single item, if, as the committee hopes, it reaches speculative transactions in stock, wheat, cotton, and futures of all descriptions, the amount of money to be derived from that has not yet been estimated up to its amount.

But I shall not stop now to dwell upon the features of the bill. I think it yields before it comes to this corporation tax too much money—more money than ought to be imposed upon the people of this country in one year.

Mr. President, at the foundation of our ability to carry on a war are the industries of this country; and whenever you put an unnecessary and too great burden upon the industries of the country you take from the ability of the country to carry the war forward to a successful conclusion.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has just told what a burden this corporation tax would be upon the industries of his State. It is all very well to say that we should pay as we go. We ought to pay for this war. The people are ready and willing to pay for it. But there is a limit. If you go beyond that limit, you weaken and cripple the ability of the country to carry on the war. It is for that reason that there should be no attempt made to impose too large a burden of taxation upon the people, even though we are engaged in the war and are subject to these extraordinary expenses.

Mr. President, this corporation tax is unjust as well as unnecessary. It is unjust for many reasons. It is unjust because it discriminates between persons carrying on the same class of business. As was well said this morning by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY], a corporation formed for the purpose of making sugar is taxed one-fourth of 1 per cent upon its gross receipts, while right along by it is another plantation which has no tax upon its gross receipts because it is carried on by individuals; and the illustration made by the Senator from Louisiana runs all through the bill.

Corporations, Mr. President, have become, to a great extent in this country, cooperative societies and nothing more. When you put a tax upon all corporations, large and small, railroad, banking, express, and the like, and at the same time trading corporations, small manufacturing corporations, corporations engaged in agricultural pursuits, you put a tax upon the cooperative energy of the people of this country. That is what the word "corporation" means—cooperation.

Now, referring to my own State, I have not the exact figures here, but I venture from what I know of corporations in the State of Connecticut to say that the average capital of the corporations in that State does not exceed $20,000.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if the word "corporations" does not come from the Latin word which means "body" rather than from the word "cooperation?"

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am not going to stop about the etymological derivation of the word. If I am wrong about it, it is a very good suggestion anyway, because more than one-half in number of the corporations of this country are but cooperative associations in which men who are able to carry on business and who have small capital have joined their capital; in which mechanics who are skilled are stockholders in manufacturing corporations; in which clerks who are skilled are stockholders in trading corporations.

I do not wish this to be overlooked, Mr. President. I understand the feeling of the present day with regard to great corporations and a desire in some way or other to get at them and to prevent their making money in the way they do. But when we come to lay a tax upon all corporations let it not be forgotten that of the corporations in this country more than one-half in number are small, made up of persons who are putting their skill and energy together just as much as they are their capital, whose capital is indeed to a large extent their skill and energy, and that when you are seeking to lay your hand heavily upon corporations because it is believed that some corporations have grown wealthy and conduct business in a way which is not sanctioned by the common judgment of mankind you are at the same time laying a heavy hand upon these most beneficent corporations.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] in his opening statement said there were at least 500 corporation creameries in the State of Iowa. I do not know how many there are in New England.

Mr. GALLINGER. New England is full of them.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But New England is full of them. I only speak of this as instancing the kinds of corporations which are swept in to be heavily taxed by this provision. When I get along a little further, I think I shall show that you can not discriminate between people carrying on the same class of business by calling them in one instance a corporation and in another a firm.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator submit to an interruption for just a moment?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Would the Senator have this tax taken off entirely or simply extended to all persons engaged in the same class of business?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That would make it a business tax. I am not prepared to say that, if the scheme of this bill had been different, I would not have been in favor of raising all the money we want practically, or a large portion of it, by a small tax upon the occupations of the country; but the scheme of the bill is different and we can not do that now. We raise money enough before we come to that.

Mr. ALLEN. I agree thoroughly with the Senator, if he will permit me to say so, that the tax should extend to all persons and associations engaged in the same character of business. I do not believe in taking the tax off; I believe in putting it on all persons engaged in like business, so that there may be exact equality.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have not really reached that portion of the argument. But the tax is unjust because it discriminates between persons carrying on the same character of business. A corporation is as much a person as is an individual, and the Supreme Court has said that you can not make that discrimination, which I shall come to by and by.

There is no reason why sugar planters whose partners have organized as a corporation should be taxed one-fourth of 1 per cent upon their gross receipts and the partnership which is not organized as a corporation should not. It is unjust.

In this connection I want to read—I am not going to read very much—what Judge Cooley says about the injustice of such taxation:

A tax on a corporate franchise may or may not be just or politic. If the business is one of which corporations have a monopoly, a tax on their franchise, however heavy, would not be burdensome, because the result would only be to add to the cost of whatever the corporations supplied to the public, so that the tax would really be paid by the community at large. If, on the other hand, the business is one open to free competition between corporations and individuals, and in respect to which corporation would enjoy no especial privileges or advantages, a tax upon the privilege of conducting the business under a corporate organization would be wholly unreasonable and unjust, because it would give individuals and partnerships an advantage in the competition; and their competition, keeping down prices, would prevent corporations from indirectly collecting any portion of the tax from the public, and leave them to bear the whole burden of a demand which, under such circumstances, must prove ruinous.

It would seem, Mr. President, as if Judge Cooley had anticipated that at some time in the history of the nation it might be attempted to lay just such a tax as is here proposed.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest, if the Senator will allow me, that he probably referred to a tax we had in this country at that time.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We never had any such tax in this country.

Mr. TELLER. We did have.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. This is the first time in our history when anybody has thought the United States Congress had the power to lay a tax upon corporations as corporations; and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] and the Senators who propose this tax industriously disclaim that it is a tax upon gross receipts or upon business, and contend that it is a tax upon corporations—a special annual excise tax on corporations. It is the first time it has ever been tried in the history of this Government.

Mr. President, such a tax is unjust for a variety of other reasons. One is because it operates unequally upon the corporations themselves. The way in which it is measured makes it operate unequally and makes it an unequal tax upon corporations. Bearing in mind now that the theory upon which this tax is proposed is that it is a tax upon the corporation because it is a corporation, the tax ought still to be equal; and this method of measuring it is extremely unequal and unjust. It depends upon the amount of the sales of a corporation how heavy the tax is to be upon it. It is a tax upon a corporation, upon the privilege, upon the franchise of the corporation, and in which the tax is tenfold more upon one corporation than upon another, according to the capital employed; yes, thirtyfold. Is that just?

To get away from the difficulty of taxing gross receipts, which the authors of this provision felt might be obnoxious to the decision in the income-tax case, they attempt to tax the franchise of the corporation, or to tax a corporation because it is a corporation. One corporation does not sell of goods the amount of its capital stock in a year, so that its gross receipts are less than the amount of its capital stock. In case they are just equal to the amount of capital, the tax upon that corporation will be one-fourth of 1 per cent upon its capital; but another corporation may sell ten, twenty, thirty times the amount of its capital stock, and consequently the tax upon the amount of the capital invested in the business as measured by that would be ten, twenty, or thirty times as great upon the one corporation as upon the other.

I want to give an illustration. I know a young man, and I knew his father. His father was a fruit merchant. The young man grew up in the business. His father left him little or no means, but he knew the business and went to New York. He had some friends there who assisted him to organize a corporation to carry on the fruit commission business. That corporation has a capital of $100,000. Its sales are $3,000,000 a year, the commission is 2 per cent, and the expense of doing business is 1.84 per cent. The only profit of the transaction is sixteen one-hundredths of 1 per cent; and yet this tax, measured upon the gross receipts, is 74 per cent upon the capital employed. Is that fair? Is it honest? Is it equal? What is true in regard to this concern is true in regard to almost every other commission concern in the country.

Mr. MASON. I wish to make this suggestion to the Senator: Is it not also true that in other mercantile corporations frequently sales are made where there is absolutely no profit at all?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I was coming to that.

Mr. MASON. Excuse me.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will speak of it now.

This tax is not only upon profitable corporations, but upon unprofitable corporations; not only upon profitable business, but upon unprofitable business; it taxes business even in the hands of a receiver if it is carried on. Is that right? Is that fair? Is that a fair way to measure a tax, if you are going to lay one on a corporation?

Mr. DANIEL. Does the Senator think we could properly make an exemption in such a case and have uniform taxation?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I did not catch the Senator's question.

Mr. DANIEL. Does not the provision that excise taxes shall be uniform require all of a similar class to be taxed alike?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not think it would be any less uniform than the provisions of this amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. That is not the question. I think it is uniform.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. You do not have to tax all corporations to lay a uniform tax.

Mr. DANIEL. That is true.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. You may lay a tax upon all business.

Mr. DANIEL. But could we exempt those? What the Senator has said is not an answer to the question. I do not understand that this bill, in any one of its aspects, presents that question, because in one section it taxes only a certain class of corporations. Could we exempt those in the hands of a receiver properly and make the tax uniform?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I agree that all taxes laid under the Constitution of the United States must be uniform.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, Mr. President; but when a corporation is in the hands of a receiver, it is not doing the business. The court is doing the business and preserving the property.

Mr. DANIEL. I was merely asking for information. It is a very nice question.

Mr. SPOONER. So that if it is a tax on the business, perhaps you could not exempt that business.

Mr. DANIEL. That is true. If the Senator is correct, if they were not a corporation, they would not be taxed as a corporation.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let us go a little further, Mr. President. This is a tax not upon profits, but it may be in many instances a tax upon losses; and it is no answer to the objection that I am making to try to raise some question about whether taxes could be laid without this result following.

We not only do that, but we tax the corporation for what the corporation has already been obliged to pay to the Government as a tax. Take a brewing corporation, if you please. This bill obliges the brewer to pay $2 a barrel upon his beer. I suppose that is about two-sevenths of the whole, or something of that sort. That becomes a part of the gross receipts of the corporation. So that when you collect the corporation tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent upon the gross receipts, two-sevenths of it is upon what is already paid to the Government.

Let us go a little further. Take a manufacturing perfumery corporation with $500,000 capital. I happen to know one such instance. That corporation pays $50,000 for its alcohol tax; it will pay for its stamps $30,000, and then it will pay $1,250 corporation tax, about one-sixth of which is upon the money which is already paid out by way of taxation to the Government.

Mr. ALDRICH. If my friend from Connecticut will permit me, the case of a distilling corporation is still stronger than the one he now states. Nine-tenths of the receipts of the distiller are represented by the tax paid to the Government, and we should be practically charging one-fourth of 1 per cent on that nine-tenths of their receipts, which are wholly used in paying taxes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is true; and these illustrations can be extended almost indefinitely.

Mr. ALLISON. May I also interject a fact?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state that 60 per cent of the distilling business is done by corporations and 40 per cent of it by individuals.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

Now, Mr. President, there is one other feature I wish to speak of in reference to this universal measurement of these taxes. There are corporations whose sales are almost entirely outside of this country, in foreign countries. This is largely true of the corporations engaged in the manufacturing of agricultural implements. Some of them have very little domestic trade, their trade being almost entirely foreign; and when you put a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent upon their gross receipts it in spirit, if not in law, is equivalent to a tax upon exports, which is forbidden by the Constitution of the United States.

So, looking at this matter in any way you please, you do not need to go and weigh the iniquity of taxing the savings banks or any other specified corporations. It is all wrong, all unjust, and I believe it to be illegal and unconstitutional.

Before I come to that, however, I wish to add one other idea with regard to the injustice of the tax. It was well said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday, as it has been said by other Senators in this discussion, that it is only right and fair that certain sources of taxation shall be left to the States. That was the reason why direct taxes were prohibited in the Constitution.

Mr. WILSON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. As I understand the Senator's argument, there will be a tax placed upon all drugs and patent medicines of every kind in a drug store, and a stamp to be placed upon them when sold, as I now understand.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If they come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. WILSON. If they come within the provisions of the bill. Will there be an addition? For instance, will the Spokane Drug Company, a corporation, have to pay, in addition to that tax, a tax upon their gross receipts?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Of course, if the provision is adopted which I am now discussing, they will have to pay at the rate of one-quarter of 1 per cent of their gross receipts, and in such gross receipts would be included the amount which they had paid for stamps.

Mr. WILSON. And they will have to pay in addition a tax on everything on their shelves?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes. I was saying, Mr. President, that the reason why the Constitution prohibited direct taxes, except by apportionment, had been stated to be that it was desired to leave certain sources of taxation open to the States. All these corporations are now heavily taxed in my own State. The manufacturing and trading corporations are taxed upon their property just as an individual is taxed locally in the towns and municipalities.

A corporation dealing in dry goods or in groceries is taxed upon the investment in the business just the same as a partnership is taxed upon the same investment; its real estate is taxed in the same way; and in fact the real estate and personal property of a corporation, I think, get taxed at a little higher rate than the real estate and personal property of an individual. Then when it comes to these other corporations, they are all required to pay a very heavy tax to the State directly.

I wish to read from the latest report of the treasurer of Connecticut some of the amounts which are paid. Mutual fire insurance companies in 1897 paid $10,030.41; mutual life insurance companies—and they get it pretty heavy in this amendment—paid to the State of Connecticut $267,670.71; steam railroads paid $874,436.95.

We were told here the other day, I think by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], that the tax upon the gross receipts of railroad corporations would only amount to two and a half million dollars in the whole country. When you see that the steam railroads of the State of Connecticut paid $874,436.95, which went into the treasury of the State of Connecticut, you can see how heavily they are taxed in that State.

Street railroads in Connecticut paid $120,765.25, and savings banks paid $353,382.81; the collateral inheritance tax paid $77,492 last year, and $135,836.50 the year before; telegraph companies and telephone companies paid $11,774.26, and express companies paid $10,429.76. Every one of those corporations which is specially taxed here pays very heavily to the State.

Mr. MORGAN. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question upon that point?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the footing up of the table the Senator has in his hand?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The items which I have read are not footed up by themselves. There are other items which do not enter into corporations which go to make up the total.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the total?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The total is $2,382,373.67.

Mr. MORGAN. Out of that $2,382,373.67 how much is upon real and personal estate in Connecticut?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. So far as it is paid directly to the State, none of it. Real estate is taxed in towns and cities.

Mr. MORGAN. As I understand it, in Connecticut the real and personal estate taxes are collected by the towns for town purposes, and the real and personal taxes in the State of Connecticut do not go into the State treasury?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We had a State tax. Each of the towns was obliged to pay according to the amount of the valuation of real and personal property, but that act was repealed in 1891 and has not been in effect since.

Mr. MORGAN. So the State of Connecticut defrays its entire expenses out of taxes upon corporations, and out of institutions of that sort, and not by taxes levied upon the property of the people?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is true; but the people are heavily taxed in their localities.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. For instance, bank shares in the city where I happen to reside are assessed at their market value, and the town and city tax upon them is a little over 2 per cent of their market value—about 2½ per cent.

Mr. President, with regard to whether this tax is constitutional or not—and I shall spend very little time upon that question—it may be said that the first section of this excise tax, as it is called, is possibly a tax upon occupation. That can not be said with reference to the second section, the one which includes all corporations. It may be said that with reference to transportation companies, express companies, telegraph and telephone companies, gas and electric light companies, and banks it is an occupation tax, because it extends to all—to persons, firms, companies, and corporations. So that as to this the discrimination as to taxing one person upon a business and not taxing another person on a business may not be so strong as in the section which relates to corporations generally.

But, Mr. President, the same objection with reference to the power of the United States to put a tax upon a corporation or the franchise of a corporation or the operations of a corporation holds, perhaps, stronger in reference to those which are specially named here than in regard to the others. I do not suppose it is to be questioned that the United States can not tax any of the instrumentalities of a State; it can not tax a municipal corporation; it can not tax the bonds issued by a municipal corporation; it can not tax the salary of a State officer; it can not tax the documents issued by a State court; and I hold that it can not legally and constitutionally impose a tax upon any corporation which performs State functions.

It could tax the property, I agree, if it were not for the income-tax decision. That is what troubles our friends on the other side of the Chamber. You can not tax the property of a corporation, because it is personal property, and because the Supreme Court has said in the income-tax decision that a tax upon personal property is a direct tax. Therefore they attempt to get away from that inhibition by saying that they put a tax on corporations.

Mr. President, certain classes of corporations perform some of the functions of the State; they discharge a portion of its duties and exercise a portion of its privileges—railroad corporations, just as much as turnpike corporations. The idea is that the obligation rests upon the State to furnish the means of transportation throughout the State.

There never was a new State organized where it was not understood to be one of the duties of the State, either to be exercised directly or through county organizations, to build roads and bridges. The duty of the State to transport by railroad or by water communication, to furnish means by railroad and water communication, is just as great as it is to furnish means of transportation by dirt roads and bridges. It is a part of the original power and function and duty of the State, and when a corporation is chartered for the purpose of operating a railroad, and given the power to collect tolls, and clothed with the power of eminent domain, it is a part of the State sovereignty. A State corporation to improve the navigability of streams, a water company, is a part of the State, as has been decided over and over again.

I am not going to read much, but I should like to read something that is pertinent on this subject from the decision in the case of the Central National Bank of Worcester and another vs. Worcester Horse Railroad Company and others, and I shall read it for the purpose of showing that a horse railroad or street railroad is as much a corporation which discharges State functions as is a steam railroad. I read from 13 Allen, 95 Massachusetts Reports, page 106, the opinion delivered by Judge Gray, now upon our Supreme Bench:

The chief characteristics of a railroad corporation, under the laws of this State, are that it is created mainly for the public benefit, and only incidentally for its own profit; intrusted with the public right of eminent domain for the purpose of taking land, at least outside of the common highways, and of laying iron rails and preparing the soil to support them; authorized and directed to carry passengers for fares in its own cars over its own rails; punishable for transgression of the rules prescribed for the public safety and convenience, and protected from interference with its rights by indictment in behalf of the public; obliged to transport the cars and passengers of other similar corporations on terms fixed by commissioners appointed by this court; having a franchise which can not be alienated, absolutely or in mortgage, without permission of the legislature; required to make annual returns showing its pecuniary condition and the mode in which it has discharged its public duties, and bound to surrender its charter and property to the public upon being paid a sum sufficient to reimburse its expenditures and a reasonable interest or profit.

So the legislature of Massachusetts has applied to that State the same law which my friend the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] wishes to apply to the street railways of the District of Columbia. It goes on to say:

A "horse railroad company," or, as it is more frequently and more appropriately called in recent statutes, a "street railway corporation," has all these attributes; and is not the less a "railroad corporation," less public in its character, or more fit to have its franchises and property transferred to assignees under proceedings in insolvency, because (as its very names imply) it more generally uses horses, instead of steam power, to draw its cars.

This case holds, first, that a steam railroad company is a corporation created for public benefit and only incidentally for private gain, and that a street railroad company partakes of all the essentials and characteristics and qualities of a railroad company. The same is true with regard to gas and water companies, electric-power companies, and all kindred companies which supply the public with what the public must have.

Mr. President, the United States can not tax the franchise of such corporations. I will not read law upon that subject. It has been held over and over again in the courts that the same rules which prevent the States from taxing the corporations of the General Government prevent the General Government from taxing the corporations of the State governments. The law is the same as applicable to each.

It has been held over and over again, from the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland down to the present day, that a State can not tax the Government corporation, because the power to tax implies the power to destroy; and if it can tax, it can destroy the instrumentalities of the Government. The same is true in regard to a State.

There is one thing which I commend to my State-rights friends. The power to charter a corporation is a State right. The United States Government can not charter a corporation in the State of New York. That right existed in the State at the time the Constitution was formed. It was not transferred to the United States. It was reserved to the State. It has been there ever since. It is a right which the State can exercise. It is a creature which the State, and the State alone, can create and maintain, and it has the right to create and to maintain it.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Federal Government can not kill it by taxation.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The power to tax implies the power to destroy. If the Congress of the United States can impose a tax upon the corporation itself as a corporation, it can destroy it; it can destroy what the State alone can create and what the State has a right to create and a right to maintain; and that is as applicable to one kind of corporation as to another.

The argument which I have been making, that Congress certainly can not tax those corporations which perform public duties and are clothed with a part of the sovereignty of the State to receive pay from the inhabitants of the State for performing the State service rendered, is, I think, impregnable, and to my mind, Mr. President, the objection that Congress can not lay a tax so as to destroy a corporation which the State alone can create, which it has a right to create, and which it has a right to maintain, is equally impregnable.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Connecticut tell us where the tax on State banks comes in, what effect it has, and where it gets its authority under the Constitution?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I suppose the Senator refers to the 10 per cent tax on the circulation of State banks?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That case has been very much discussed. I have never found any two lawyers who agreed as to what the doctrine of the case was. I think the opinion of the Chief Justice puts the decision not upon the ground of the right to tax, but that the law was justified upon the ground that the Constitution gave to Congress power to maintain a uniform currency, and therefore it had a right to prohibit the currency of the States.

Mr. BACON. I think if the Senator will examine he will find that there were two decisions on that subject, and that the first one did not put it upon that ground, which is the main decision.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have read that case a great many times and discussed it a great many times.

Mr. BACON. The first one put it distinctly upon the exercise of the taxing power.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have not got the case here—I thought I might have it—but I do not regard it at all as a case to the effect that Congress can lay a tax upon a corporation. But that was not a case, at any rate, where Congress undertook to tax the corporate franchise. This amendment is limited to that kind of a tax, as was shown in the colloquy which I had with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. I asked the Senator:

Does the scheme which the Senator has been presenting take the form of a tax upon gross receipts?

Mr. DANIEL. Not at all.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Do I understand that that is the nature of the tax?

Mr. DANIEL. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I understood the Senator had been arguing that it was a tax upon the gross receipts of these corporations, individuals, and companies.

Mr. DANIEL. The bill must speak for itself in that regard, but I will answer the Senator fully.

So the Senator disclaims that it is a tax upon the property of the corporations. It is a special annual excise tax on the corporations themselves because they are corporations, which is equivalent to a tax upon the franchise.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President—

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Now, referring to the case of Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, before I forget it—and then I will yield to the Senator from Wisconsin—if the Senator from South Carolina will take the dissenting opinion in that case, rendered by Justices Nelson and Davis, I think—

Mr. GRAY. In what case?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Veazie Bank vs. Fenno; and if he will read that dissenting opinion with reference to the law as it was laid down in the income-tax decisions, I think he will have no doubt as to what the Supreme Court would hold now as to the taxation therein referred to, if it was taxation. I never supposed it was.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will take the dissenting opinions in the income-tax case and read them he will see that some of the strongest judges there consider that this Government is irrevocably crippled in time of war by that decision.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am not upholding the income-tax decision or discussing it at all. I suppose it to be the law of the land. I see where it pinches when it is proposed to tax the gross receipts of corporations. You can not lay a tax upon incomes. How can you lay it upon gross incomes, which are gross receipts, if you can not lay it upon net incomes?

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator consider the decision of the Supreme Court in the legal-tender cases the law of the land?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Oh, yes; the decisions of the Supreme Court are the law of the land.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why not issue greenbacks to carry on the war, as we did the last, and get rid of this tax, which is so obnoxious?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not know anything in the legal-tender cases which makes it obligatory upon the Government to issue greenbacks, and I think it is a very ruinous practice.

Mr. GRAY. The power to kill a man does not imply that you ought to use the power.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] desired to interrupt me.

Mr. SPOONER. It was only for a single purpose and in line with the suggestion which the Senator made a moment ago as to the peculiar character of this tax or excise. The Senator read an extract from his colloquy with the Senator from Virginia [Mr.

DANIEL] to show that it was not a tax on gross earnings. I wish to call the Senator's attention to this language:

That every corporation doing business in the United States, whether chartered under the laws of the United States, or of any State or Territory of the United States, or any foreign country, shall pay a special annual excise tax; and said tax shall be—

Not a tax of such a per cent on the gross earnings, but it—shall be the equivalent of one-fourth of 1 per cent of the whole amount of the gross receipts.

The language is quite peculiar.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It not only intends to lay a tax upon State corporations, on corporations chartered by a State, but on corporations chartered by foreign countries—a corporation tax, an excise tax, a franchise tax.

I agree, as I have already said, that if it were not for the decision in the income-tax case, which says that a tax on personal property is a direct tax, Congress might lay a tax upon the property of corporations, but they can not lay it upon the franchise, because the State alone has the power to grant the franchise and to maintain it, and when they attempt to destroy that which the State has a right to grant and maintain, they interfere with the sovereignty of the State. The doctrine that a tax upon the property of a United States corporation may be laid by a State, but not upon its operations, is to be found in the Nebraska case (18 Wallace), from the opinion on page 36, at the bottom of the page.

But, Mr. President, the proposed amendment is unconstitutional upon another ground. It is unconstitutional for want of uniformity and for discrimination, because it does not afford to all the citizens of the country the equal protection of law; and in the Texas case recently decided (the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe Railroad Company vs. Ellis, 165 U. S. Reports) the court expressly hold that you can not make this discrimination between persons carrying on the same business, because part of them are corporations and part of them are partnerships or individuals. I want to read that:

The rights and securities guaranteed to persons by that instrument—

The Constitution of the United States—

The rights and securities guaranteed to persons by that instrument can not be disregarded in respect to these artificial entities called corporations any more than they can be in respect to the individuals who are the equitable owners of the property belonging to such corporations. A State has no more power to deny to corporations the equal protection of the law than it has to individual citizens.

If Mr. A is carrying on the business of silver mining in one county and Mr. B is carrying on the business of silver mining in another county, the United States can not tax the business of Mr. A and not tax the business of Mr. B; and if it so happens that instead of Mr. A it is a corporation composed of three individuals, chartered under the laws of the State, Congress can not within its constitutional power impose a tax upon the corporation and not upon the individual.

Mr. DANIEL. May I not ask the Senator from Connecticut if those limitations in the Constitution to which he refers are not solely limitations upon the State and not upon the Federal Government? Have they ever been regarded as limitations upon the Federal Government?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The provision which requires that all taxes, imposts, duties, and excises shall be uniform is not a provision in reference to the States. It is in reference to Federal taxation.

Mr. President, I do not know but that I have said all and more than I ought to have said upon this proposed tax. I can recapitulate in a word. There is too much revenue raised by the bill before we come to the amendment in question. If adopted, the bill will raise more revenue than the people of the country ought to pay for this war in one year. Secondly, it is unjust and unequal in its operation. It places a burden upon business which it can not afford; and third, in my judgment it is merely providing for a lawsuit which is to be determined against the Government on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the act.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, it seems impossible for the Federal Government, under the present interpretation of the Constitution, to levy internal taxes at all unless they be levied upon consumption or industry. It is impossible in view of the income-tax decision to reach the profits arising from accumulated wealth, and hence policy and power alone are to be considered. Within the last four or five days I have received two or three hundred letters in regard to this tax bill, and every one of my correspondents has pointed out that the tax to be levied upon his particular industry is absolutely destructive of that industry, but that the taxes to be levied upon other industries seem to be not only within the constitutional taxing power of Congress, but such equal and proper taxes as ought to be imposed.

The question of taxing corporations is one of policy and of constitutional power. No man pretends that corporate property ought not be taxed, both by the State and Federal governments, if it be necessary that it shall be so taxed, just as other property may be taxed by both governments. But the questions we have here are whether a particular method of assessing taxes against corporate property is a fair one and whether under existing conditions the Federal Government ought to resort to that character of taxation even if it has the power to do so.

I have been a little surprised to find in this discussion that it is on this side of the Chamber the powers of the Federal Government have been magnified and the rights and powers of the State governments systematically minimized. My friend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] undertook to show that because the Congress of the United States had succeeded in working out the power to establish a national bank, a corporate agency had thereby been created which stood far above like agencies created for like purposes by the States. In dealing with the question of railroad franchises created by the Government of the United States, which the State of California had undertaken to tax, he reached the conclusion that those railroad franchises created by the Federal Government for a Federal purpose were clothed with a sanctity which like franchises created for a like purpose by a State government does not possess. I shall read from the case in 127 United States Reports:

Assuming, then, that the Central Pacific Railroad Company has received the important franchises referred to by grant of the United States, the question arises whether they are legitimate subjects of taxation by the State. They were granted to the company for national purposes and to subserve national ends. It seems very clear that the State of California can neither take them away nor destroy nor abridge them, nor cripple them by onerous burdens. Can it tax them? It may undoubtedly tax outside visible property of the company situated within the State. That is a different thing. But may it tax franchises which are the grant of the United States? In our judgment it can not.

Then the court proceeds to define a franchise. It says:

Generalized and divested of the special form which it assumes under a monarchical government based on feudal traditions, a franchise is a right, privilege, or power of public concern, which ought not to be exercised by private individuals at their mere will and pleasure, but should be reserved for public control and administration, either by the government directly, or by public agents, acting under such conditions and regulations as the government may impose in the public interest, and for the public security. Such rights and powers must exist under every form of society. They are always educed by the laws and customs of the community.

Under our system their existence and disposal are under the control of the legislative department of the Government, and they can not be assumed or exercised without legislative authority. No private person can establish a public highway, or a public ferry, or railroad, or charge tolls for the use of the same, without authority from the legislature, direct or derived. These are franchises. No private person can take another's property, even for a public use, without such authority, which is the same as to say that the right of eminent domain can only be exercised by virtue of a legislative grant. This is a franchise. No persons can make themselves a body corporate and politic without legislative authority. Corporate capacity is a franchise. The list might be continued indefinitely.

In view of this description of the nature of a franchise, how can it be possible that a franchise granted by Congress can be subject to taxation by a State without the consent of Congress? Taxation is a burden, and may be laid so heavily as to destroy the thing taxed or render it valueless. As Chief Justice Marshall said, in McCulloch vs. Maryland, "The power to tax involves the power to destroy." Recollecting the fundamental principle that the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are the supreme law of the land, it seems to us almost absurd to contend that a power given to a person or corporation by the United States may be subjected to taxation by a State. The power conferred emanates from, and is a portion of, the power of the Government that confers it. To tax it is not only derogatory to the dignity, but subversive of the powers of the Government and repugnant to its paramount sovereignty.

That is the rule as between a State and a franchise granted by the Federal Government for the execution of a Federal power.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will pardon me just one moment, a little further in that opinion they deal with the case of the Southern Pacific, which was a State corporation, upon which a Federal franchise had been conferred, and held that it could not be taxed.

Mr. LINDSAY. The court held that the Federal franchise could not be taxed.

My friend says, "but that is a Federal franchise, and as said in the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland all the people of the United States are interested in a Federal franchise, and therefore a State can not tax a Federal franchise," and he argues that the rule does not apply to a State franchise when the corporation claims that it can not be taxed by the Federal Government. I do not say that there are not certain privileges, certain rights, certain exemptions which the members of private corporations enjoy that may not be taxed by the Federal Government, but what I undertake to say is that where a State has invested a corporate agency with a portion of its own sovereignty for the purpose of executing a State function, for the purpose of carrying into execution a right, power, and duty of the State which the State possessed at the outset, which it never surrendered to the Federal Government, but holds as a reserved right, it impinges as much upon the dignity of a State to tax that franchise without its consent as it impinges upon the dignity of the Federal Government to tax a franchise granted by it.

I do not admit the superiority in dignity of the delegated powers of the Federal Government over the reserved powers of the States, which are governmental in their nature. Within the domain of its delegated powers the authority of the Federal Government is paramount. Within the domain of the reserved powers of the States their powers are paramount, and the Federal Government can no more tax a State agency public in its character than the government of a State can tax a Federal agency.

Mr. DANIEL. May I ask the honorable Senator what he thinks of the decision of the Supreme Court taxing State banks on their circulation?

Mr. LINDSAY. In the first place, the Federal court abandoned in the latest decision the ground upon which it sustained this taxation at the outset. At first it was held that the power to tax was conclusive of the question; but in the second case, when pressed with arguments against the right to tax the circulation of State banks the court's decision was rested upon the idea that the Federal Government possesses the paramount authority to supply currency to the people, and in the exercise of that paramount authority it has the right, in such a manner as it may see proper, to take out of competition with Federal currency the currency of the State banks; and that having the power to prohibit the State banks from issuing currency at all, it has the power to impose conditions upon the issue of that currency if it chooses to go no further than to impose conditions.

Mr. DANIEL. Let me ask the Senator another question?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. If, then, the Federal Government has that paramount power as to railroads as well as to banks, does not the same principle apply to railroads as to banks?

Mr. LINDSAY. I have not admitted that it has authority to tax a bank as a bank, or that it has authority to levy a tax upon the franchise which the State grants to its bank, as long as the bank keeps within the legitimate business of banking. Its established authority goes no further than the right to prohibit a State bank from issuing currency coming in competition with the currency issued by the Federal Government.

In the case of Collector vs. Day (11 Wallace) the Federal court undertook to define the relative rights of States and of the Federal Government. The court said:

The General Government and the States, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other within their respective spheres. The former within its appropriate sphere is supreme, but the States within the limits of their powers not granted, or, in the language of the tenth amendment, "reserved," are as independent of the General Government as that Government, within its sphere, is independent of the States.

That is the true philosophy of our complex system of government.

Mr. GRAY. That opinion was by Mr. Justice Nelson, was it not?

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes; it was delivered by Mr. Justice Nelson. Again, in the same opinion, the court said:

If the means and instrumentalities employed by that Government (the Federal) to carry into operation the powers granted to it are necessarily exempt from taxation by the States, why are not those of the States, depending upon their reserved powers, for a like reason equally exempt from Federal taxation? Their unimpaired existence in the one case is as essential as in the other.

If in order to carry out one of the delegated powers of the Federal Government it becomes necessary to grant a Federal franchise to a corporation engaged in interstate commerce and the franchise of that Federal agency is exempt from State taxation, why, when a State grants a like franchise to a domestic corporation in order to subserve the interests of domestic commerce, is not that franchise exempt from Federal taxation if the rights of the States within their respective spheres are equal to the rights of the Federal Government within its specially delegated sphere?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I am inclined to agree with the Senator entirely in the line of his argument; but has the Senator been able to discover any possible theory upon which it can be declared that a railway company created by the United States is a national agency or instrumentality and a railway company created by a State is not a State agency or instrumentality?

Mr. LINDSAY. I confess my inability to answer the suggestion made by the Senator as to the possible distinction, if such a distinction be possible. We treat a railway as a public highway. The States succeeded to all the rights of the British Government over their respective territorial possessions.

Mr. DANIEL. May I ask the Senator if he thinks the same doctrine would apply to any corporation chartered by a State—for instance, one to buy and sell real estate or one to sell dry goods or one to sell oleomargarine?

Mr. LINDSAY. I do not insist that the same doctrine does apply. My contention is this—

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the Senator where the line would run. If the State in its public policy thought it desirable to incorporate the people to sell boots and shoes or brooms, why would not the Federal Government have to stand off and say, We can not interfere with that because the State has made a franchise?

Mr. SPOONER. That would be a mere business corporation.

Mr. LINDSAY. I set out with the statement that the argument I proposed to make does not apply to corporations which are strictly business corporations. To draw the line exactly at the point where a duty ceases to be governmental, strictly governmental duty, and becomes a business enterprise, is very difficult.

Mr. DANIEL. Then may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. In so far, then, as the corporation chartered by the United States was business in its nature as contradistinguished from the subexercise of some governmental function, could it not also be taxed by the same State?

Mr. LINDSAY. The Government of the United States can not charter a strictly business corporation to do business within the confines of a State. There is no delegated authority to the Federal Government to create such corporations, and therefore I need not answer the question of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. How about one of the Pacific railroads that takes up goods in one part of Texas or in one part of California and delivers them at another part of the same State? Is not that business the transportation of goods?

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. And so with express?

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. Or passengers?

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. Can not the State, then, tax that part of the business which is purely local and distinctly domestic business as contradistinguished from what is interstate?

Mr. LINDSAY. Neither the Federal court nor any court has ever held that the business of a railroad corporation created by the Federal Government can not be taxed by a State. What that court has held is that the right to exercise the franchise granted by the Federal Government can not be taxed as a franchise.

Mr. ALLEN. Simply because it is a governmental agency.

Mr. LINDSAY. Simply because it is a governmental agency, and for that reason and no other. The court admits the right of a State to tax all the property of the corporation and to reach the valuation of that property in any legitimate way.

Mr. TURLEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. TURLEY. I wish to call the Senator's attention to one point. As I understand his argument, it is based on the idea that when the State creates a railroad corporation it does it for some public purpose. Under the present practice of creating corporations, in nearly all the States it is done under a general law. For instance, that general law will provide a means by which any set of individuals can create a railroad or create a bank or create a corporation to deal in boots and shoes.

The State does not take the initiative at all, but leaves any citizens within it to create the corporation. They can create a thousand railroads by way of corporations. Is it possible that when citizens go in under a general incorporation law of that sort and create railroads that every railroad is a public instrumentality of the State? The State does not inaugurate it, but as many railroads as citizens choose to create by way of corporations can be created—a dozen in a county or a hundred in a county.

Mr. SPOONER. Is not that a question entirely for the State to determine?

Mr. TURLEY. But it illustrates that the creation of such a corporation is not essential to or necessary for the carrying out of any power of State sovereignty. It is purely a matter of the convenience of private individuals.

Mr. LINDSAY. The method by and through which the State creates a particular corporation does not at all determine the character of that corporation. If a State creates a particular railroad company by a separate enactment, then there is a special contract between the State and that corporation growing out of that particular act of incorporation. But if the State makes a general proposition to all the people who choose to accept, that in certain ways and under certain conditions a railroad corporation may be organized, the very same character attaches to the corporation and like duties attach to the corporate agency. It is essentially the same character of agency as though it had been created by special or particular act.

The point I was coming to is this: The States took as the successors of Great Britain all the governmental powers of Great Britain. One power essentially governmental was the power to provide public highways for the accommodation of the people and in furtherance of the domestic commerce of the States. Therefore the States took the right to create, to manage, to establish, to control all the public highways within their respective boundaries used strictly for the domestic commerce of the State. When it came to the creation of railroads, when the question arose whether or not States could authorize local municipalities to take stock in railroad companies, when the question was raised whether railroad companies could condemn the lands of the people, those questions were settled, and settled affirmatively, upon the idea that a railway is a public highway, that a railroad company is a public agency, and that a railroad company in consideration of the rights granted it by the State undertakes to discharge duties which it is within the power and province of the State to discharge.

So every railroad in Virginia, every railroad in Kentucky, is a State highway which owes its existence to the will of the State, which answers the purpose of the State, and which assists in carrying out the governmental ends of the State.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield for a question?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. As I understand the position of the Senator, it is that where a corporation is organized, either under a special or general law of the State, so that it obtains corporate franchise from the State sovereignty, such franchise, or the right to carry on the business of a corporation in accordance with the terms of the franchise, can not be subject to Federal taxation, although such taxation may not, in any degree, interfere with the function of that corporation in its service of the State.

Mr. LINDSAY. That is my theory.

Mr. RAWLINS. How, then, does the Senator defend the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Telegraph case, I think reported in 142, in which it expressly lays down the doctrine that whether a governmental agency is exempt from taxation depends upon whether the tax materially interferes with the function which it is designed to perform as an agency of the State, and therefore the court held that a telegraph company which was granted the privilege and maintained the right upon certain conditions over public lands was subject to such taxation?

Mr. LINDSAY. That was a State tax, I take it?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes.

Mr. LINDSAY. The authority was granted by the State, and all the Federal Government did was to grant the right of way over the public lands.

Mr. RAWLINS. No; but in that case the court distinctly laid down the principle, not that every corporation franchise which may in some of its phases be a governmental agency can not under any circumstances be taxed because it is such a governmental agency, but they will also inquire further whether the tax will interfere with the performance of its functions as an agency of the State.

Mr. LINDSAY. I still do not understand that that was a Federal agency, but that it was a State agency, with the right of way over certain public lands, and taxed by the State which granted it the right to exercise its franchise. The point I make is that a State franchise, intended to carry into execution a State power governmental in its character, can not be taxed at all by the Federal Government, and the inquiry never can arise whether the tax interferes with the discharge of the duty, because the power to tax involves the power to destroy, and as the power to destroy a State agency does not exist, therefore the Federal power to tax it does not exist.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will permit me, is it not the very reason for the exemption of a corporation created by one sovereignty from taxation by another that such taxation will injure or impair its functions as such State agency, and if it fails and does not do it, does not the reason fail, and is not the property subject to such taxation?

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, State agencies are not exempt from Federal taxation. The term is a misnomer. The States never delegated to the Federal Government the power to tax their agencies. Therefore, it is not necessary that State agencies shall be exempted from Federal taxation. The States were free governments; all their agencies were absolutely untrammelled; no power could tax them, except themselves; nobody could regulate those agencies except the States, and when we came to form the Federal Government, that Government took only such authority as the States delegated. Therefore the States reserved their powers and the Federal Government did not exempt the States from its power to tax.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will permit me, it is true that the States retained such power as they did not delegate to the Federal Government, but in the creation of the Federal Government certain general powers of taxation were conferred with certain express limitations and certain others which the courts have implied; and amongst others which are implied is that an agency which is necessary for the preservation of the existence of a State government must be exempt from taxation by the Federal Government. Is not that right?

Mr. LINDSAY. No, sir; it is just the reverse. The Federal courts have, fortunately for the States, never yet implied power in the Federal Government to tax a State agency, and I hope the Federal courts may never imply that power, because when they do they will overturn the theory of our duplex system of independent governments.

Mr. RAWLINS. I think the Senator misunderstood the statement which I made.

Mr. LINDSAY. No; I do not think I did.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will permit another question, I will not interrupt him again.

Mr. LINDSAY. Very well.

Mr. RAWLINS. My question was not intended to imply that a power not conferred by the States would be implied in the Federal Government to tax a State agency, but that there was no express limitation upon the power of the Federal Government which would exclude the State agencies from taxation, and that that limitation upon the general power conferred upon the Federal Government was an implied limitation and not an express one. I think the Senator from his remark took my word "implied" in the very opposite sense in which I intended to use it.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, my theory about the grants of power to the Federal Government to tax is that the grants are express, and that all legitimate implications are such only as necessarily arise in order to enable the Government to carry into execution the grants expressly made.

There never was a grant to tax States as States, and there never has been an implication of the power to tax the agencies of the State governments as contradistinguished from the taxation of the States. My theory is, and it was the theory of the Democratic party, that the States are as independent in regard to their domestic affairs and in regard to their domestic agencies as the Federal Government is independent in regard to national affairs and national agencies, and a doctrine which conflicts with that overturns that which has been understood, at least by this side of the Chamber, to be the true construction of the Constitution from the foundation of the Government to this time.

To say that the Federal court would declare this legislation unconstitutional and therefore void if we enact it into a law is further than I care to go. It is further than it is necessary for me to go. We are levying a tax now to meet an exigency brought about by a state of war. It is most important that the provisions of the law shall be constitutional and that money shall be raised as Congress intends it shall be raised.

Mr. SPOONER. We want to furnish dollars, not lawsuits.

Mr. LINDSAY. If there are lines of taxation about the constitutionality of which there is no dispute, is it not wisdom upon our part to keep ourselves within those lines rather than to go into a dispute between the State and Federal governments and to give to the country lawsuits instead of money with which to prosecute the war against Spain?

I picked up a newspaper this morning published in Philadelphia, one which I suppose has been more universally indorsed by members of this body, and especially by Senators sitting on this side of the Chamber, than any other newspaper published in the United States, or that was ever published in the United States. I refer to the American newspaper. The editor in his last issue discusses the two bills, the one that came over from the House and the bill reported by the majority of the Finance Committee, and also the differences between the minority and the majority of the Finance Committee, and then undertakes to estimate the amount of taxes that will be realized under the bills. Having entered into and satisfied himself with this discussion, he concludes:

But the probabilities are that the tax on banks and corporations would be declared unconstitutional, and it is also quite possible that one of the taxes agreed upon by both Democrats and Republicans, namely, the inheritance tax, would be held unconstitutional. And if such taxes were cut out, the bank and corporation and inheritance taxes, as unconstitutional, the Democratic provision would be cut down from the estimated $417,000,000 to $332,000,000, or nearly $50,000,000 less than the estimated expenditures.

Whether this newspaper editor be a constitutional lawyer it is not for me to say, but if I had the time to read the testimonials to this editor which originated on this side of the Chamber, I would at least establish the proposition that the constitutionality of these three classes of taxation is so far open to doubt as that prudent men should not rely upon them to raise money to meet the exigency which is now upon us.

Suppose we have the constitutional power to tax these corporations; suppose we have the constitutional authority to tax these franchises, is it good policy at this time to exercise that authority? When the Constitution was before the American people for consideration, and before it had been adopted, the grant of power to raise revenue by internal taxation was called in question by many eminent men upon the idea that if the Federal Government should be given, first, exclusive power to tax imports, and then the coordinate power with the States to levy internal taxation, the result might be that the States would be crippled, if not disabled, from performing their governmental functions by reason of the Federal Government exhausting the field of State taxation.

Mr. Richard Henry Lee, in a paper on this subject, said:

Further, as to internal taxes, the State governments will have concurrent powers with the General Government, and both may tax the same object in the same year; and the objection that the General Government may suspend a State tax as a necessary measure for the promoting of the collection of a Federal tax is not without foundation.

As the States owe large debts and have large demands upon them individually, there clearly will be a propriety in leaving in their possession exclusively some of the internal sources of taxation, at least until the Federal representation shall be properly increased.

Now, if there is a propriety in leaving to the States exclusively some character of internal taxation, I ask what can with more propriety be left than the franchises which the State governments grant and which they have the power to revoke and the absolute power to control? Why take from the States the right or why encroach upon the rights of the States to the exclusive authority to tax corporate franchises which they have created? Mr. Hamilton, who was not a State-rights man and who did not believe in a State-rights constitution, felt called upon to answer this objection, and he answered it in this way in the thirty-sixth number of the Federalist Papers:

The laws—

Speaking of the taxing laws of the States and the General Government—can not therefore, in a legal sense, interfere with each other, and it is far from impossible to avoid an interference even in the policy of their different systems. An effectual expedient for this purpose will be mutually to abstain from those objects which either side may have first had recourse to. As neither can control the other, each will have an obvious and sensible interest in this reciprocal forbearance; and where there is an immediate common interest we may safely count upon its operation.

Again, in the thirty-second number of the Federalist he said:

It is indeed possible that a tax might be laid on a particular article by a State which might render it inexpedient that a further tax should be laid on the same article by the Union, but it would not imply a constitutional inability to impose a further tax. The quantity of the imposition, the expediency or inexpediency of an increase on either side, would be mutually questions of prudence, but there would be involved no direct contradiction of power. The particular policy of the national and of the State system of finance might now and then not exactly coincide, and might require reciprocal forbearances.

In the State of Kentucky the constitution requires that all corporate property shall be taxed as other property, and then it requires that upon the franchises of the corporations an additional tax shall be laid. The result of this is that one-fifth of all the revenues raised by the State for State purposes is raised from taxation levied upon corporate property, and over one-fourth of all the taxes raised for local purposes is raised by taxation levied upon the property and franchises of corporations.

Our method of arriving at the value of the franchise is simple. All the bonds issued by the corporation are added together at their market value, and all the outstanding stock of the corporation is added together at its market value. This forms the maximum value of the corporate property. The tangible property is taxed in kind. The value thereof is deducted from this aggregate value, and the difference is taxed as the value of the franchise. There is no possible way for a corporation to escape full taxation in the State of Kentucky. The new constitution provided against it, and the legislature has been swift to carry into force the provisions of the new constitution.

Then, so far as this proposed franchise tax is concerned, it is taxation upon property created by the act of the Kentucky legislature. Why not let the people of Kentucky have the full benefit of that taxation? If the corporations will bear greater franchise taxation than we have levied, why shall the Federal Government come in and appropriate that additional ability to pay? Why not let the State of Kentucky increase its franchise tax? This bill, if it becomes a law, will directly interfere with the State of Kentucky in the taxation of its own corporations, in the taxing of the franchises it creates, and which the Federal Government can neither create, protect, nor destroy.

I insist, in the language of Hamilton, who was not a State-rights man, but who did have some respect for the powers of the States, that as the States have appropriated this particular character of property to State taxation, the Federal Government shall keep its hands off. If the corporations of Kentucky shall be crippled by Federal taxation, and if the amount of taxes raised in the State shall thereby be reduced, we do not have, like the Federal Government, the right to look to import duties. Our only remedy will be to turn upon the real estate and personal property within our territorial limits and increase the rate of taxation against such property.

We have a case in which it is proposed that we shall resort to legislation of doubtful constitutional character and to an unnecessary and officious interference by the Federal Government in the domain of State taxation. Of course the time may arrive when the needs of the Federal Government would be so great that this idea of comity will be discarded and the Federal Government, for self-preservation, will tax everything it has the constitutional power to tax. But we have not reached that time yet. A war with an insignificant power like Spain is not of itself sufficient to justify the Federal Government in taking the extreme ground, in disregard of the reasonable claims of the States, proposed to be taken by this bill.

I shall not discuss the fairness of this tax. You have but to state the proposition, and you will see that it is absolutely unfair.

Against each corporation we propose to levy a tax equal to one-fourth of 1 per cent of all its gross receipts. We have a hundred corporations in my State engaged in lawful business, converting agricultural products into distilled spirits. Before the owner of these spirits can put them upon the market the Government of the United States requires him to pay a tax equal to $1.10 per gallon, or about eight times as much as the original market value of the product; and when he makes his sales, his gross receipts are made up of 15 cents' worth of whisky and $1.10 of Federal taxation, which is already paid, and then you propose to require him to pay one-fourth of 1 per cent of that tax, already extorted out of him, in the way of a corporation tax.

Mr. WHITE. Will it interrupt the Senator from Kentucky if I make an inquiry for information?

Mr. LINDSAY. Not at all.

Mr. WHITE. Under the laws of Kentucky it is possible, I suppose, to organize a corporation for the purpose of dealing in cigars or manufactured tobacco?

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. Assuming, at any rate, that such is the law and such a corporation could be formed, would the Senator believe that the Government of the United States could levy any tax upon the transaction of that business by way of gross receipts or as a condition for the transaction of the business?

Mr. LINDSAY. I am coming to that. That is the next proposition I was going to consider.

Mr. WHITE. Very well.

Mr. LINDSAY. Nearly every tobacco manufacturing company in Kentucky is a corporation, and the Federal Government taxes manufactured tobacco 12 cents a pound.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Kentucky must not misunderstand me. I do not refer to the amount of the tax or to its policy. I am merely referring to the constitutional power of the Federal Government to impinge thus upon a corporation existing under the laws of a State and permitted to exist only by those laws.

Mr. LINDSAY. I have not discussed the constitutional power of the Federal Government to levy a tax upon the receipts of a strictly business corporation. My argument against the constitutional power was directed to corporations which were strictly governmental agencies created to carry into execution strictly governmental powers. I am now arguing the fairness of this proposed taxation as it affects the Kentucky tobacco factories, and I will say for Kentucky that she raises and sells nearly as much tobacco each year as all the other States in the Union combined, and the tobacco interest is one of our principal agricultural and one of our principal manufacturing interests.

This bill proposes that for every pound of manufactured tobacco there shall be placed a tax of 12 cents a pound; upon cigars $3 a box or a hundred, whatever the tax may be; upon snuff a tax equally as onerous; and yet this same bill provides that when the tobacco-raising people of Kentucky, through their manufacturers, have satisfied this oppressive taxation, the factory man shall again pay one-fourth of 1 per cent upon the gross receipts of his business, made up of this 12 cents of tax and 6 cents' worth of tobacco.

These suggestions show that the bill which proposes this tax has not had that kind of consideration by the Committee on Finance it was entitled to receive.

It is not a tax upon the gross earnings; it does not purport to be a tax upon the gross earnings, but a tax upon gross receipts. Go back to railroad companies. A shipment is made by one company a thousand miles, and the transportation is over lines owned by three or four separate companies. The railroad company at the far end collects all the tolls and they go into its gross earnings and it is taxed one-fourth of 1 per cent. It turns over to the three other roads their proportion of these same receipts and they go into the gross receipts of the other three roads and are again taxed.

The language is "gross receipts," not "gross earnings." If it were "gross earnings," then there might be a division of earnings; but it is gross receipts. The courts may hold that "gross receipts" mean gross earnings, but if "gross receipts" are intended to mean "gross earnings," why not say "gross earnings" instead of "gross receipts?"

So much, then, for the propriety of this legislation; so much for its constitutionality; so much for the unnecessary invasion of the domain of taxation which ought to be left to the States exclusively.

Now I come to another proposition, and that is, that we are to borrow a portion of the money to be used in conducting this war. My friend from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] said a great deal about paying as we go; but this bill on its face shows that we are not to pay as we go to the fullest extent of our expenditure, but that our credit is to be applied to the part payment of the current expenses of the war. It is not denied that we must borrow a portion of the moneys with which the war is to be carried on.

We may borrow money by selling bonds to those who are willing to buy the bonds and make the loan, or we may borrow money by issuing legal-tender notes and putting them in circulation, with the power in the courts to compel every creditor to accept them in satisfaction of his debt whether he wishes to receive them or not.

It is said that by borrowing through the instrumentality of legal-tender United States notes we save interest, and it is therefore a matter of the highest economy to borrow in that way.

We were told the other day by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] that greenbacks were an ideal money, that in the direst hours of national distress during the civil war the country was saved by borrowing money through legal-tender United States notes, and that we all voted for it without regard to party—of course applying his remarks to those who lived north of the rebellious States—and that Mr. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury, was held up as a second Saviour when he devised this scheme of borrowing money, and thus save the country from absolute ruin.

I have had the curiosity to go back to see whether we all voted for this character of money or not, and I find that in the House of Representatives the bill did not receive a single Democratic vote, and that a number of leading Republicans voted against it. I find when the bill came over to the Senate that leading Republican Senators tried to strike the legal-tender provision from it, that such provision was kept in by a vote of 23 to 17, and that only three Senators calling themselves Democrats voted to keep it in. One of these was the Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Garrett Davis, who did not at that time claim to be a Democrat.

Mr. President, after the war had been fought out, a case got to the Supreme Court involving the question whether those who favored or those who opposed the issue of legal-tender notes had the correct view of the Constitution; and this same Secretary of the Treasury, who had then become the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, sitting as a judge, and speaking for a majority of the court, after due consideration, decided that the legal-tender act was unconstitutional, because power to enact it had not been delegated to the Federal Congress; and these same Democrats, after this decision, pointed to the great Chief Justice as a man who, under the stress of political surroundings, was driven to that which was of doubtful propriety, but who, sitting as Chief Justice of the greatest court in the world, rose to the dignity of the occasion and declared that the act which he himself had recommended was not authorized by the fundamental law of the country. We looked to Chief Justice Chase then as the great representative of the Democratic idea of the want of power in the Federal Government to create money by its own mere fiat.

Afterwards the court was increased by an additional justice and a judge retired from the bench, and then a Republican President filled the two vacancies. The constitutionality of the legal-tender act again came before the court, and then it was held that this act, which Chief Justice Chase had declared to be unconstitutional, was a constitutional act; and then the Democrats said—and they appealed to the country to justify them in saying—that political considerations had influenced the appointment of the two new justices, and that the great court had been reconstructed in order to have the Constitution set aside and a void enactment declared valid.

It may be said that that case and a subsequent case have established the constitutionality of legal-tender money, and that Democrats may yield, as all good citizens ought to yield, to the final decision of the court of last resort; but it does not follow that Democrats shall change their opinions, and at the first opportunity, plant themselves upon ground formerly occupied by those with whom they did not agree and which was denounced by them at the time as flatly in the face of the Constitution.

But did the greenbacks prove an ideal money during the civil war? In 1868 the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, was moved to say:

So far has the legal-tender currency been from performing the equitable and harmonious functions of money, in its relations to trade and industry, that it has been the great disturbing element. By it all relative values have been unsettled, trade interrupted, and industry disorganized to such an extent that the whole foreign and domestic trade has been compelled to adjust itself over and over again to the altered condition of the currency. Nothing has been permanent. Violent fluctuations have characterized the market for every commodity, and speculation has usurped the place of regular and legitimate traffic.

That was written three years after the close of the civil war, and we know that it was a correct picture of the facts as they were then understood. The country did not resort to greenbacks as a matter of choice, as it is proposed we shall now do. Federal credit was broken down, Treasury notes could not be used at all, money could not be borrowed upon the bonds of the Government, and the necessities of the situation drove Congress into the adoption of a policy it did not approve.

Mr. Fessenden, a Senator from Maine, in the discussion of the bill, said:

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in advocating the measure, declared that it was not contemplated and he did not believe it would be necessary to issue more than $150,000,000 of Treasury notes, made a legal tender, as provided by this bill. All the gentlemen who have spoken on this subject, and all, pretty much, who have written on the subject, except some wild speculators in currency, have declared that as a policy it would be ruinous to any people; and it has been defended, as I have stated, simply and solely upon the ground—

Not of good policy, not of voluntary action by a government which had the liberty to act as it pleased, but—that it is to be a single measure, standing by itself, and not to be repeated. * * * The ground upon which this clause, making these notes a legal tender, is based I have already stated. It is put on the ground of absolute, overwhelming necessity, that the Government has now arrived at that point where it must have funds, and those funds are not to be obtained from ordinary sources or from any of the expedients to which we have heretofore had recourse; and therefore this new, anomalous, and remarkable provision must be resorted to, in order to enable the Government to pay off the debt that it now owes and afford circulation which will be available for other purposes.

That is but a specimen of the statements made by those who voted for the bill. The Government had been reduced to the necessity of raising money through the instrumentality of a forced loan, and that overwhelming necessity alone, it was admitted, justified the act. Treasury notes would not circulate, sufficient taxes could not be collected to answer the purposes of the Government, and money could not be borrowed. In fact, Mr. Blaine says that at that time Confederate bonds were more readily taken in the European markets than the bonds of the Federal Government. Yet to-day, with our credit reestablished, with 75,000,000 of people, with seventy-five billions of property, with better credit than any government ever enjoyed, it is proposed that we shall do that which was done in 1862 under the overwhelming necessity which then confronted the Government.

Senators say that we are to issue only $150,000,000. It was said in 1862 that $150,000,000 was all that would be needed, and while only about $450,000,000 of greenback legal-tender notes were actually issued, yet at the end of the war there was one billion six hundred millions of floating debt outstanding, including those greenback notes, and which in the end had to be funded into interest-bearing bonds.

I do not understand, unless it be some of our Populistic friends, that anybody wishes to issue legal-tender notes which are not to be redeemed in coin. There may be a difference of opinion whether they should be redeemed in gold coin or in silver coin, or in gold and silver indiscriminately. But I do not understand that anybody now claims that paper money ought to be issued which is not to be redeemed at all. Nor have I heard anyone say that our necessities are such at this time that we ought to issue $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes, payable at the Treasury on demand, without making any provision whatever for their redemption when such redemption is demanded.

At the end of the civil war, and after the vast outstanding floating liabilities had been funded and it was determined to reduce the volume of greenbacks to $346,000,000, the Treasury Department, with the knowledge and approval of Congress, set aside $100,000,000 in gold to be used as a redemption fund. An act of Congress authorized the sale of bonds to raise that $100,000,000. It was set apart and has been kept through all the fluctuations of our financial policies up to this time as a redemption fund. Nobody insists that $100,000,000 in coin is too much.

The policy was established under Mr. Harrison's Administration, and it was kept up under Mr. Cleveland's Administration, and I may say it is the policy of this Administration, that these outstanding United States notes, as well as the Treasury notes issued to pay for the silver bullion bought under the Sherman Act, shall be redeemed in gold. Many believe that the precedent set by Secretary Foster was a vicious one. Many believe it was a mistaken policy upon the part of Mr. Carlisle to follow the precedent set by Mr. Foster, insisting that gold or silver ought to be paid at the option of the Government in the redemption of these notes. The insistence was not that either coin should be paid at the option of the creditor, but at the option of the Government.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is speaking of Mr. Carlisle's and Mr. Foster's policy?

Mr. LINDSAY. Many people contended that it ought not to have been followed and that the redemption ought to have been made in gold or silver indifferently.

Mr. BACON. At the option of the Government.

Mr. LINDSAY. At the option of the Government. But in 1896 this great issue was submitted to the American people and an Administration was put in power which is pledged to maintain the gold standard until that indefinite point of time at which an international agreement may be reached for the general coinage of gold and silver by the leading business countries of the world. We are to-day living under an Administration pledged to redeem in gold the $346,000,000 of greenbacks, and pledged to redeem in gold the $100,000,000 of Treasury notes issued under the Sherman Act, and now we propose to increase the volume of notes to be thus redeemed to an aggregate of nearly $600,000,000 and to leave in the Treasury only $100,000,000 of gold for their redemption.

If we are in good faith issuing greenbacks which are to be redeemed when presented, and $100,000,000 in gold is only enough for the redemption for $446,000,000 of demand notes, when we increase that volume $150,000,000 ought we not to increase relatively and proportionately the redemption fund?

Mr. RAWLINS. The proposition which I understand the Senator to indorse is that $100,000,000 of Treasury certificates, bearing interest at a rate not to exceed 3 per cent per annum, shall be issued payable within one year from date. I ask the Senator if, according to his theory and understanding, the $100,000,000 of paper would not be payable in gold under the policy of this Administration?

Mr. LINDSAY. We take in that paper in payment of taxes, and when we take it in we destroy it; but the $150,000,000 provided for by this bill is to be redeemed whenever redemption may be demanded and then reissued, as the act of 1878 provides existing greenbacks shall be reissued.

Mr. RAWLINS. I do not think that is quite an answer to my question. These interest-bearing Treasury notes are to be paid within the time specified. If they are paid and not merely taken in exchange, in accordance with the policy which I understand the Senator to approve—the policy of the Administration—would they not be payable in gold?

Mr. LINDSAY. Of course the Administration might pay them out of any money in the Treasury, because we have no established policy as to these notes, but we have an established policy as to greenbacks, and we have an established policy as to the Sherman Treasury notes and as to this other proposed issue, which I have not yet indorsed, and the Senator does not know that I will—

Mr. RAWLINS. No; I do not.

Mr. LINDSAY. There is this distinction, that when the $100,000,000 is retired it is retired for good, while the other is to be kept in circulation, a standing menace to the gold reserve.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will permit me, take the other side of the proposition, $100,000,000 of noninterest-bearing Treasury notes, which are also a legal tender. If they are presented to the Treasury for redemption, as they may be, the same as other outstanding notes of similar character, I suppose they would be treated in the same way.

Mr. LINDSAY. They may or may not be.

Mr. RAWLINS. If they are treated in that way, they will be treated precisely as the $100,000,000 of interest-bearing notes.

Mr. LINDSAY. Except they would not become a permanent charge on the gold reserve.

Mr. RAWLINS. Proceeding one step farther, they would be to the extent of $100,000,000 a charge upon the gold reserve within the period of a year. The Senator proposes, or it has been proposed—I do not wish to charge that to the Senator—that we issue $500,000,000 of bonds, drawing interest at a certain rate, payable after ten years at the option of the Government, but which must be paid within twenty years. Those bonds, if the same policy is pursued, would be a charge upon the gold reserve, present or future.

Mr. LINDSAY. Twenty-year bonds, I believe.

Mr. RAWLINS. Now, the question which I propounded to the Senator is whether these two items, $100,000,000 within a year and $500,000,000 with interest accruing to be paid within the time specified, will not be a much greater charge upon the gold reserve or to the people who will be compelled to furnish the gold reserve than the $150,000,000 of which he has been speaking?

Mr. LINDSAY. A demand note, the payment of which may be called for to-morrow, is a very different thing from a twenty-year bond, the payment of which need not be provided for until the principal falls due.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will submit to one other interruption, I will not disturb him further. The difference between these Treasury notes and the bonds—

Mr. SPOONER. It is impossible to hear the Senator from Utah.

Mr. RAWLINS. The difference between the Treasury notes and the bonds is that the former are made legal tender in payment of debts. In other words, they are available by reason of that function for use for debt-paying purposes in the transaction of the business of the country, thus making them available to meet an already existing demand for money which will absorb and utilize them and prevent their being presented to the Treasury for redemption, while the other obligations do not possess that feature.

Mr. LINDSAY. If the Senator does not see a distinction between a debt payable twenty years hence and one payable on demand, then I do not feel myself equal to answering the question.

Mr. RAWLINS. I did not ask as to the distinction, but relatively.

Mr. LINDSAY. Now, as to the other branch of the case, if my argument condemns the notes which trouble the Senator from Utah, let those notes go, because my argument is consistent with human experience and with common prudence. I had no representative standing for my peculiar financial views on the Committee on Finance, and am under no obligation, moral or political, to vote for any provision of the pending bill which does not meet my approval. I am now discussing the propriety of increasing the fixed charge upon the gold reserve $150,000,000 without making provision to increase the gold reserve, so that the notes may be redeemed when they are presented for payment.

It is said that during twelve or fifteen years after we resumed specie payments very few notes were presented for redemption. That is true. Within the last two years very few notes have been presented for redemption, and as long as gold flows from the other side of the Atlantic into the United States, and there is more gold than the business of the country demands, the gold will find its way into the Treasury, and the greenbacks, as the more convenient currency, will keep themselves in circulation. But suppose conditions change—and we know that they do change—and the demand for gold in Europe becomes greater than the demand for gold in the United States, and profit can be made by shipping gold to the other side of the water, then people will bring their demand notes to the Treasury and demand redemption in gold.

My friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] said in his speech the other day that the question of silver coinage, except as to the seigniorage, had been adjourned over for future consideration by the people. Therefore I take it that no one expects during the remainder of this Administration, that these notes will be redeemed in any other coin than gold. If we do not wish to go to a paper basis, if we are all opposed to fiat money, and if we intend to increase the permanent volume of demand notes, ought we not to correspondingly increase the reserve fund out of which those notes are to be redeemed from time to time?

I do not understand that this side of the Chamber has ever committed itself to the expansion of the currency through the issuance of legal-tender notes. A majority of this side of the Chamber has insisted that any deficiency in the volume of currency ought to be made good by the free coinage of silver money, but I do not understand that any member on this side has ever held that the demand notes of the Government ought not to be promptly met in coin of some kind when presented at the Treasury.

It is proposed to coin $42,000,000 of silver, but that coinage is not to be put into the Treasury to be held as a part of the redemption fund. Upon the contrary, the coinage is to be anticipated, certificates are to be issued, and those certificates are to be used in paying the current expenses of the Government. So that although we may increase the volume of our silver coin $42,000,000, and increase the volume of our legal-tender currency $150,000,000, it is not proposed to add a single cent to the redemption fund, either in gold or silver.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Kentucky will permit me, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I believe it will be conceded that all parties and all interests in this country agree that we ought to have a greater volume of currency of some kind—that is, some good currency. There is simply a difference with respect to what it shall consist of. A very large element favor a banking currency, and various schemes have been suggested by which the country can be supplied with a volume of money to make up what is a recognized deficiency, through the medium of a banking currency, and every one of those schemes, without exception, is based upon the credit of the country as the ultimate resource for final redemption for such banking currency.

The question I desire to ask the Senator from Kentucky is whether, if we are to have a paper currency—whether, if it be impracticable, by reason of differences of opinion, to have an entire coin currency and we are reduced to the necessity of a paper currency, and in each instance a paper currency dependent finally upon the Government for redemption—it is better that that currency shall be the immediate issue of paper by the Government or whether it shall be the indirect issue through the medium of banking currency, because that is what it amounts to? In one case it is a direct issue by the Government and in the other case it is an indirect issue, in the fact that the Government at last is looked to for its redemption. Which is the better of those two—a direct issue by the Government or an issue through the medium of banking corporations, with the Government at last depended upon for final redemption?

Mr. LINDSAY. If that question were before the Senate, I would feel under some obligation to attempt to answer it, but the question now before the Senate is how to raise money for the purpose of carrying on the war with Spain. The question of my friend would imply that advantage is being taken of the immediate necessity for money to incorporate in the bill a provision the real purpose of which is to expand the currency.

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstands me. The purpose of my inquiry was this: The Senator is arguing against the propriety of the issuance of a certain kind of currency by the Government on the ground that it would not be a safe currency. I am simply calling his attention to the fact that there is a universal demand in this country for an increase of currency and that those who agree with him as to the impropriety of the issuance of legal-tender greenbacks advocate a banking system in which currency shall be issued by banks with an ultimate dependence upon the Government for the redemption of such currency. Therefore the argument is not as suggested by the Senator, but that if such a currency could be regarded as a sound currency, the issuance of legal-tender greenbacks would also properly be regarded as a more sound currency, and if there is need for it, the propriety of the issuance would be manifest.

Mr. LINDSAY. The point I was discussing was the ability of the party who issued the paper to redeem it in the currency which is recognized as the standard currency of the country.

I wish to say that the banks are in much better condition to redeem their currency in gold than this provision of the pending bill will leave the Government if it shall become a law. The banks under existing conditions may issue currency equal to 90 cents on the dollar of bonds deposited, and those bonds are deposited with the Government and the Government guarantees the redemption of the notes in gold, and if the banks refuse or fail to redeem, the Government can offer existing bonds, which everybody wants to buy and pay for in gold, and therefore the gold will always be on hand to redeem the notes of the banks.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator is mistaken in the obligation of the Government. The Government does not guarantee that it will redeem the national-bank notes in gold. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. TURPIE. Nor as to the bonds.

Mr. BACON. Of course, but I am speaking of national-bank notes.

Mr. LINDSAY. My friend—

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I am not standing upon the question to which I see the Senator is about to reply, probably, raised by the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana. I am saying that there is no guaranty on the part of the Government and there is no practice on the part of the Government to redeem national-bank notes in gold. There may be a practice, an unauthorized practice as I certainly contend, to redeem legal tenders and Treasury notes in gold, but there is no practice, so far as I have been able to inform myself, and certainly no requirement of law, by which national-bank notes are redeemed in gold.

Mr. LINDSAY. I am not going off to argue these abstract questions. The Government holds the bonds and the bonds are pledged for the redemption of the bank notes, and the bonds are payable in coin just as the greenback is payable in coin. This Administration is pledged to pay the interest and the principal of the bonds, if not in gold, in money equal in value to gold; in other words, in order to maintain the gold standard it is not necessary that every demand shall be paid in gold, but that every obligation of the Government and every obligation guaranteed by the Government shall be met in money exchangeable with and equal in value to gold, and that is the state of case with which we now have to deal.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator, then, if he will pardon me, to take the position that the Government is bound by the construction of certain officials, although the letter of the law is to the contrary. In other words, the law may be repealed by the pledge of a political party.

Mr. LINDSAY. I do not think the Senator understands me in that way, and I am sure I said nothing which authorizes any such inference. I said we are legislating to-day in view of conditions known to all, and one of those conditions is that we have an Administration pledged to the redemption of all the obligations of the Government in money equal in value to gold. Whether the Secretaries of the Treasury had a right to put the Government in that attitude is not for me to say.

It is enough that this Administration was elected upon the pledge that it would pay in gold, and nothing has happened that will justify any Senator in believing it does not intend to keep that pledge.

Mr. SPOONER. Nothing will happen.

Mr. LINDSAY. With a full knowledge of that fact we propose to issue $150,000,000 of notes payable on demand in money as good as gold and which will be paid in money as good as gold so long as this Administration is in power, and yet we do not make provision for a dollar in gold or silver for the redemption of that $150,000,000 of demand notes.

Mr. BACON. Yet I understand the position of the Senator to be that if the $150,000,000 is issued in the shape of banking currency, it may be safe for the Government to undertake the final redemption of it, even though it has not in that instance made any provision for gold to pay it with.

Mr. LINDSAY. I have not said so, nor have I said anything that authorized the inference. The question of bank currency is not up for consideration. Who knows what we would do if we were called upon to revise the national-bank act? But I do say that under an act for which I am not responsible, for not a single provision of which I voted, we have a currency guaranteed by the deposit of bonds, which bonds can be sold in the market for gold, not only for an amount equal to the outstanding bank notes, but for an amount 10, 15, or 20 per cent in excess of the outstanding bank notes. Therefore that currency is good under existing conditions, and that is the end of the bank question.

Mr. RAWLINS. I do not understand, or if I do I hope the Senator will make it clear, that the Senator contends that we are here in our legislative policy to conform to the declaration of a political platform, especially of the Republican party, which has not been embodied into law.

Mr. LINDSAY. I do say that if we do not legislate in view of conditions which we know to exist, then we will not legislate wisely or intelligently. That is my answer to the question.

But my friend need not be uneasy about the redemption of these greenbacks in gold. The amendments reported by the majority of the Committee on Finance do not provide for the repeal of the act of 1875. They leave that act in full force, and while the majority of the committee object to issuing bonds to raise money to pay the expenses of the war, preferring to issue greenbacks payable on demand, and which this Administration is pledged to redeem with gold, they leave the act of 1875 in full force, so that when a raid may be made upon the Treasury, if the raid shall be made, with the additional $150,000,000 of greenbacks, this Administration can keep its pledge, as the last Administration maintained the gold standard, by selling bonds more objectionable in form and stipulations than the bonds provided to be sold under the bill as it came from the House, and especially under the report of the minority of the Finance Committee.

So we are in this attitude: It is a question whether we shall sell bonds to raise money to pay the expenses of the war or whether we shall increase the volume of greenbacks and force the Government to sell bonds to put gold in the Treasury to keep the greenbacks at par with gold, when the gold speculators choose to make a raid upon the Treasury, after we have increased their facilities 25 per cent by the bill you propose to enact into law.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the object of it.

Mr. LINDSAY. It is not a question of bonds. At either end of the line we have bonds. It is a question whether we will sell bonds as provided for by the minority report of the Finance Committee or whether we will sell bonds under the act of 1875, and everybody knows this to be the case. There will probably be no raid upon the Treasury, I hear it intimated. When did we get this sudden confidence in the moderation of the gold speculators and the Treasury raiders? What has happened in the last two years to make us believe that when those people can make money by exporting gold they will not raid the Treasury with the greenbacks now outstanding, and raid it the more successfully with the greenbacks which this bill provides shall be put into circulation?

My friend from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] two years ago, in discussing this question, did not give his unqualified approval to legal-tender money. Stating his objections, or stating points that did not meet his approbation, he said:

One of these is found in that part of section 4 which compels the reissue of greenbacks whenever redemption takes place. For myself I do not believe we shall achieve the restoration of orderly finance until the present system of reissuing demand notes of the Government is abandoned; and whenever a fair and conciliatory plan looking to that end is presented to the Senate, I expect to vote for it.

With that sentiment I am in hearty accord.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator from Kentucky excuse me for an interruption?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. CHILTON. I stated the same thing yesterday. I call the Senator's attention to my remarks.

I do not disguise from myself a recognition of the fact that it is ordinarily undesirable to increase the outstanding paper which may be presented for redemption, and I would prefer a condition where gold and silver were both coined, both invested with the money function, and each form of coinage permitted to stand upon its own weight, which I believe would be an equilibrium.

If we could establish that policy and issue gold and silver certificates to give the people the convenience of a paper representative of money, I would be glad to see all redeemable paper banished from circulation.

But it is not a question of what we would do as an original proposition, but it is a question of alternatives.

Mr. LINDSAY. I had no idea of attempting to show that the Senator had changed his views on that subject.

Mr. CHILTON. No; I understand that.

Mr. LINDSAY. I quoted his statement because it is apt, because it is well put, and because it is convincing.

The point I make is this: We can not have at this time the free and unlimited coinage of silver. We can not and we do not propose to put silver dollars in the reserve fund to redeem greenbacks. Now, then, if it would be bad policy, after we have the right to redeem the legal-tender notes with both gold and silver, to reissue them, I submit, is it not worse policy to reissue them and keep them outstanding as demands against the Treasury when we have only one kind of coin with which we can redeem them?

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator excuse one further interruption?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. CHILTON. My proposition is this: It is now a choice between issuing bonds which bear interest or issuing legal-tender United States notes, which may possibly threaten some future burden to the Treasury by the process of redemption. I believe it is cheaper, especially in view of the vitalizing influence upon business which an issue of paper money will bring, to encounter the peril, if peril it may be, of putting out this additional amount of legal-tender currency than to load ourselves with hundreds of millions of bonds to run from ten to twenty years, upon which the people of this country must pay interest indefinitely.

Mr. LINDSAY. I am glad to find that my friend and I do not differ in principle; that we agree in principle; and that our difference is only as to the cheaper mode to raise this $150,000,000. Is it cheaper to issue notes to be redeemed in gold on demand, and reissued and redeemed again on demand, and reissued and redeemed indefinitely, as under the policy and during the remainder of this Administration, than it is to sell 3 per cent bonds, which run from ten to twenty years and which can not be presented for payment until the people shall have had ample opportunity to go to the silver standard, if they shall choose to go to it at any time in the future? I say that under the gold standard the greenbacks have been the most expensive obligations this Government has ever issued. They bear no interest upon their face, but they compel the sale of interest-bearing bonds for their redemption.

Mr. CLAY. Will my friend from Kentucky yield to me that I may ask him a question?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator says that our greenbacks have been the most expensive money we have ever had. I desire to ask the Senator, when did they become expensive? Is it not true that from 1879 to 1891, a period of thirteen years, when there were nearly $400,000,000 of Treasury notes and United States notes in circulation, less than $35,000,000 United States notes were presented for redemption?

Is it not true that up to 1891 not a single dollar of Treasury notes was presented for redemption? Is it not true that from 1891 to 1895, a period of four years, nearly $300,000,000 were presented for redemption, and that can be attributed to the fact that up to that time, 1891, the Government had never announced its policy to redeem in gold, but it was simply the policy of the Government to pay in either gold or silver at the option of the Government? So soon as the Government announced the policy not to pay in either gold or silver, then this paper money was presented for redemption and became expensive.

When it was the announced policy of the Government to exercise its option to redeem the money issued by the Government in either gold or silver at the option of the Government, then there was no raid on the gold reserve; but when the Government surrendered this option and redeemed in gold at the option of the creditor, then, to force the issue of bonds, raids were made on the gold reserve. The gold reserve was never in danger till this option was surrendered by the Government.

Mr. LINDSAY. Now, Mr. President, I will go back to 1868, when we did not redeem in either gold or silver, and let us see what the Secretary of the Treasury said about the cheapness of this money at that time:

So far has the legal-tender currency been from performing the equable and harmonious functions of money in its relations to trade and industry that it has been the great disturbing element. By it all relative values have been unsettled, trade interrupted, and industry disorganized to such an extent that the whole foreign and domestic trade has been compelled to adjust itself over and over again to the altered condition of the currency. Nothing has been permanent. Violent fluctuations have characterized the market for every commodity and speculation has usurped the place of regular and legitimate traffic.

Mr. ALLEN. Is that the language of Secretary McCulloch?

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes, that was the language of Secretary McCulloch, and McCulloch was drawing a faithful picture of the effects of greenback currency up to that day.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Secretary McCulloch was the known and open enemy of greenbacks.

Mr. LINDSAY. Of course he was.

Mr. ALLEN. And without authority, in violation of positive law, he called in and destroyed over a billion greenbacks up to 1874, when he was stopped by the act of that year.

Mr. LINDSAY. Four hundred and fifty million was all that was ever issued.

Mr. ALLEN. But they were issued and reissued until they amounted to over a billion.

Mr. LINDSAY. They could not have been destroyed if they were reissued.

Mr. ALLEN. They were destroyed, and if the Senator will turn back to the early reports, he will find that to be true. Mr. Logan, when a member of the Senate, called attention to the fact that over a billion had been destroyed by this man—different forms of paper money.

Mr. LINDSAY. Oh, yes; different forms of paper money. We issued Treasury notes bearing 7.3 per cent interest, and we issued Treasury notes bearing 6 per cent interest, and we managed by the end of the war to get out in the way of floating indebtedness of one kind or another a billion six hundred million dollars, including four hundred and fifty millions of greenbacks.

Mr. ALLEN. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact set forth in the report of Mr. Spinner, which was a portion of the Treasury report, that we issued during the war all told over $6,000,000,000 in paper money of different forms.

Mr. LINDSAY. Not in legal-tender greenbacks.

Mr. ALLEN. Legal tenders, 7.30 notes, certificates of indebtedness, and other forms of paper money which Mr. Spinner says were issued and used for the purpose of money.

Mr. LINDSAY. Well, that is out of my line, and I shall not discuss this ancient history; but I suppose my friend will agree with me that 7.30 notes were not a cheaper currency than 3 per cent bonds.

Mr. ALLEN. I do agree with you in that.

Mr. LINDSAY. The point I was trying to answer was the point made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], that greenbacks had been a cheap money. Now the Senator from Nebraska says that McCulloch destroyed a billion of them. There were only four hundred and fifty millions ever issued. McCulloch was destroying money that bore 7.30 and 6 per cent interest, and which was a high-priced money, and if such money is to be treated as greenbacks, then my statement is more than borne out by the facts.

Mr. ALLEN. Of course the Senator does not desire to misrepresent me.

Mr. LINDSAY. No, sir; but it is my speech that is being made.

Mr. ALLEN. My statement goes out, too. I say that according to the Treasury reports over $1,000,000,000 of different forms of Government paper money was called in and was destroyed, and that was stopped finally by the act of 1874 and again by the act of May 31, 1878.

Mr. LINDSAY. I need not dispute that proposition. It is not in my line of argument, but I will say that, except $450,000,000 of that money, it could not have been cheap money, because it bore interest at different rates, none of which was as low as 3 per cent, which these proposed bonds are to bear.

Secretary McCulloch retired greenbacks, but he had the authority of Congress to retire them; and their retirement was stopped at $346,000,000 by an act of Congress providing that the former act should not be further carried into effect. Secretary McCulloch was guilty of no crime. He was acting within the law. It may have been a mistaken policy, but whether he acted within the law or outside of the law, whether his policy was good policy or bad policy, the question is, Was that statement true, that this outstanding money disorganized trade and encouraged speculation and compelled business people to readjust their plans of business two or three times in the course of three or four years? If greenback money brought about that result, it was the dearest money the people could have had, whether it taxed the Treasury or not.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to make a suggestion in this connection?

Mr. LINDSAY. I will.

Mr. BACON. The effort to withdraw this money so disarranged business and so threatened the country with absolute ruin that the Congress of the United States, after having directed its withdrawal, had to interpose its act and stop it and direct that no more of it should be permanently withdrawn. That does not look as if it was a very great enemy to the prosperity of the country.

Mr. LINDSAY. Does that prove it was not a dear money? Does that prove it would not have been better if no such money had been issued and we had had a currency which did not need to be controlled and regulated by act of Congress from year to year?

Mr. BACON. I fully agree with the Senator. If we could have all coined money, of course I should be opposed to any paper money; but as the barrier has been put up and you say we shall not have coined money, but that the great majority of our currency shall be paper, then the best obligation is the obligation of the Government.

Mr. LINDSAY. Now, let us see about that best obligation. Two years ago this matter was under discussion. I believe my friend here [Mr. ALLEN] was responsible for it. A distinguished member of the Finance Committee, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], had occasion to comment upon this kind of money. I think my friend from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] had indulged in some statement to the effect that the greenbacks were ideal money, and the best we ever had.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—

Mr. LINDSAY. I will not say that is true, but he would be liable to make that statement if he had the provocation.

Mr. ALLEN. I will say it now.

Mr. LINDSAY. The Senator from Arkansas said then:

The truth is that the silver certificates are to-day performing the office of the paper money of this country. The greenbacks are not performing it. On the contrary, they are held by the banks for the purpose of taking the gold out of the Treasury whenever they want it, whenever they choose to increase their holdings. In the last sixty days—

I think this was January, 1895—

as I have just stated, there has been more than $50,000,000 in gold so drawn out of the Treasury, and of that $50,000,000 only $15,000,000 was drawn out for export. The other $35,000,000 was drawn out to be hoarded, to be held in banks; and this will continue—

Now, how long?—

and this will continue as long as we allow this convenient means of depleting the Treasury to remain in their hands—

Now, we have permitted it to remain in their hands until to-day, and the proposition now is to increase their facilities 25 per cent over the facilities they held at the time these statements were made—

Whenever they choose to force a bond sale they can do it by drawing out the gold to the limit which the President considers dangerous, and after the bonds are bought the gold paid for them can be immediately drawn out of the Treasury to be hoarded in the banks, as stated by the President, and we are no nearer relief after it has been repeated a dozen times, and after $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 of bonds have been issued than we were when we began.

That was the Democratic idea of greenbacks in January, 1895; that they did not answer the purposes of money; that they were held by the banks and by gold speculators, and that the banks and speculators raided the Treasury with them whenever they could make profit by raiding the Treasury, and thereby compelled the sale of bonds under the act of 1875. This bill proposes to give these raiders $150,000,000 of demand notes in addition to what they held in 1895; it stands by the gold standard, as this Administration is pledged to stand; it leaves the act of 1875 in force, so that the excellent gentlemen who make money by raiding the Treasury can raid it 25 per cent more successfully than they could when the Senator from Arkansas exposed conditions which no man then disputed and no man can now dispute.

Mr. ALLEN. Where does the Senator get his authority for constant, repeated redemption of the greenbacks?

Mr. LINDSAY. The greenbacks under the act of 1878 are reissuable. This bill proposes that the contemplated $150,000,000 shall be reissuable after being redeemed.

Mr. ALLEN. But I submit to the Senator there is no statute upon our books which authorizes it. There is no more than a single redemption.

Mr. LINDSAY. Now, my friend, I will say to you that a statute practically means that which those whose duty it is to enforce it and who have the power to finally enforce it construe it to mean.

Mr. ALLEN. That is, if a man sees fit to construe a law in violation of its letter and its spirit, he is free to do so?

Mr. LINDSAY. No, not that in point of fact, but practically that.

Mr. ALLEN. That is, no officer of the law, not the Secretary of the Treasury, is bound by the statute.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will say that that great question was argued out in 1896. All the arguments which the Senator now presents were then presented to the American people.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator wants to retire from the argument, I have no objection.

Mr. LINDSAY. Oh, no; I am not retiring from the argument. I am making an argument to show where this bill will lead, existing conditions being considered.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will excuse me for interrupting him once more, I will not do it again.

Mr. LINDSAY. Very well.

Mr. ALLEN. I say there is not a letter or syllable on our statute books authorizing more than a single redemption, and that every redemption beyond that has been made with the full knowledge on the part of the officer that he violated the law when he did it.

Mr. LINDSAY. Now, let us concede that to be true; I ask the Senator why the committee put into the bill a provision that these greenbacks after being redeemed shall be reissued and kept in circulation.

Mr. MORGAN. I think I can settle this difficulty between the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Kentucky evidently believes that the Republican party will not do to trust on this subject. And they believe the same thing.

Mr. LINDSAY. Probably they do.

Mr. MORGAN. Therefore, of course, if they all believe the same thing, it will not do to trust them.

Mr. LINDSAY. What I say is that the Republican Administration, if this bill becomes a law, will redeem these notes in gold, and that the Republican Administration will sell bonds under the act of 1875 to get gold, if it shall prove necessary to do it. My friend from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] would not if he were President and if his party were in power.

Mr. ALLEN. But I would observe the law and have my party observe it.

Mr. LINDSAY. But the trouble is that your party is not in power.

Mr. ALLEN. But it will be.

Mr. LINDSAY. We shall then legislate in view of your party being in power and keeping its pledges.

Mr. ALLEN. That is right.

Mr. LINDSAY. But we are now proposing to legislate in view of the Republican party being in power.

Mr. ALLEN. It will not keep its pledge.

Mr. LINDSAY. It has pledged itself to keep to the gold standard.

Mr. SPOONER. And will do it.

Mr. LINDSAY. And my friend from Wisconsin, who speaks by authority, says it will do it.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I do not speak by authority.

Mr. LINDSAY. I do not mean express authority; I mean that authority which comes from a long and intimate acquaintance with the Republican party.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to make a little calculation in line with his argument.

Mr. LINDSAY. I am not good in mathematics.

Mr. RAWLINS. It is as to the charge that the greenbacks are subject to reissue upon the gold reserve. Take a ten-dollar note of that description. It is presented at the Treasury, for which the party presenting it receives $10 in gold. The gold in the Treasury is depleted to the extent of $10, and a ten-dollar greenback takes its place. There is a demand upon the Treasury for the payment of the debt or expense of the Government to the extent of $10, and the Treasury has the alternative of paying out that $10 or $10 in gold.

It reissues the $10, and this gold reserve remains the same as if the Treasury had paid out $10 in gold. The gold reserve is depleted $10. When the greenback $10 is reissued, its holder may again present it, demanding gold, and receive $10, and the result is precisely the same. I have never been able to understand the method of calculation by which it is claimed that the reissuing of these notes has any effect whatever as an extra burden upon the gold reserve. Dollars necessarily go back to the same thing, provided the same amount of money is expended by the Government in its expenses.

Mr. LINDSAY. I think the Senator from Arkansas explained that so that nobody ought to misunderstand it, but I shall try again. The pending bill proposes or contemplates that we shall use for paying war expenditures all the money now in the Treasury except the $100,000,000 to be held as a redemption fund. It contemplates that the proposed $40,000,000 of silver certificates shall be used. It contemplates that the $150,000,000 of greenbacks shall be used. So at the end of the year all the gold that we shall have in the Treasury will be $100,000,000.

Suppose some syndicate comes down to Washington with a hundred million dollars of greenbacks to-day and takes that hundred million dollars of gold out of the Treasury, and another syndicate comes down with a hundred million dollars of greenbacks to-morrow and demands gold, where is it to come from? I think if you get rid of your ten-dollar experiment and go to a hundred-million-dollar experiment, you can see very well how you may deplete the gold redemption fund of the Treasury.

Mr. COCKRELL. Are not all the members of these gold syndicates pure, unadulterated patriots who will sacrifice everything for the country's good?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly they are.

Mr. COCKRELL. And yet you say there is danger that they will come down and raid the Treasury?

Mr. LINDSAY. Of course I do; and the reason I say that is that you people, who profess to be the enemies of those patriots, are adding to their power to raid the Treasury by giving them $150,000,000 more of demand notes, so that they may have 25 per cent more power than they had when the Senator from Arkansas explained how this process was carried out.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why do we do it? It is because they have sworn for years and years that they were the only patriots in the country. Now we have an opportunity to test their patriotism, and we intend to do it if possible. We shall see whether they will come and raid the gold in the Treasury and cripple the Government in every way they can. I want to test them. I want this opportunity to see whether they are the unadulterated patriots they claim to be.

Mr. LINDSAY. The difference between my friend and myself is this: He still believes they are patriots and I do not [laughter]; he still believes they will not raid the Treasury, and I believe they will; he insists upon giving them more power, and I protest against it. I know what the gold syndicate will do; I know what any speculator will do, even in time of war. Combinations of speculators will utilize any advantages you give them; and here is a proposition to give these people an advantage which they do not now possess.

Mr. RAWLINS. The Senator answered me by a dissertation on patriotism. Will he now go back to the question which we were discussing?

Mr. LINDSAY. I wish the Senator to answer me whether or not my proposition is correct. If there is only $100,000,000 in the Treasury and the speculators come with $100,000,000 of greenbacks and take it out, do they not deplete the gold reserve?

Mr. RAWLINS. I understood the contention to be that this $100,000,000 of silver certificates—

Mr. LINDSAY. I am not speaking of silver certificates.

Mr. RAWLINS. Then that the $100,000,000 of outstanding greenbacks, if they come in and demand gold, under the policy of the Administration, will get the $100,000,000 of gold, and there will be no money left in the Treasury. If there is any outstanding obligation of $100,000,000 which the Government of the United States is compelled to pay, and it has $100,000,000 with which to pay it, it will be as well off with the greenbacks as it now is with the gold. It can pay them out, and the result will be the same.

Mr. LINDSAY. It may be as well off—and I will not argue that it will not be—but this Administration is pledged, and you know it, that, whether the Government be as well off or not, whenever you take the gold out of the Treasury it will sell bonds and put gold back; and the pending legislation is to be considered in view of our knowledge of that fact.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LINDSAY. Of course.

Mr. STEWART. Were the gold men such hypocrites that they were fooling us when they all declared that they wanted to get rid of the greenbacks? If it was advantageous to them to have greenbacks, as represented by the Senator, they ought to want them; but they appear to be against them. If they can use greenbacks to their great advantage and to the disadvantage of the country, to the extent the Senator has been recently arguing, why is it that they are opposed to greenbacks? Or does he believe they are for greenbacks and are saying what they do not mean? How does he think the gold men understand this question?

Mr. LINDSAY. I will answer that question. There are some men who believe in the gold standard who are not engaged in the business of raiding the Treasury, and there are other men who believe in the gold standard who do engage in raiding the Treasury when they can make profit thereby.

Mr. STEWART. I thank the Senator for that information; I never heard it before.

Mr. LINDSAY. They are just like the silver men. There are some men who believe in free silver coinage and who will go through almost any kind of sacrifice to get it; but there is another set of silver men, who represent silver interests, who will go for free coinage if they can not sell their silver, but will let free coinage go if they can make more money by selling their silver than they can by coining it. Human nature is human nature, and it manifests itself in the same way, whether a man believes in the gold standard, the silver standard, or the bimetallic standard.

Mr. STEWART. All depending upon the profits.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will say that since 1890, when the representatives of the silver interests voted against the unanimous voice of the Democratic party in favor of the Sherman purchasing act, whereby the coinage of silver was abandoned and silver was bought and held like cord wood, I confess I have some doubt whether all the silver men believe that free coinage is the greatest blessing that can come to them. That is all I have got to say about that.

Mr. STEWART. Do I understand the Senator to say that we could have got free coinage at that time?

Mr. LINDSAY. I understand you had a free-coinage bill passed through the Senate, and that when the conference report came back it not only abandoned free coinage, but abandoned coinage under the Bland-Allison Act—abandoned all coinage except $2,000,000 a month for eleven months, and provided for the purchase of the surplus—

Mr. STEWART. I beg your pardon. No such bill as that ever passed. If the bill that did pass had been honestly executed, it would have secured free coinage. There can be no doubt about that. It provided for the coinage of $2,000,000 a month for one year, and thereafter the coinage of a sufficient amount to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes issued thereunder. The Administration refused to do that, but said that the Treasury notes should be redeemed in gold. They would not execute the law. In addition to that, the Administration of Mr. Cleveland formed a syndicate with foreign purchasers, so that there were only two purchasers in the market, and thus manipulated the market.

If that act had been executed, it would have produced free coinage, because it was provided in the act that when silver reached 29 the mints should be opened to it. Silver went up, and continued to go up until it reached 21, and it was still going up when a combination was formed to put down its price. There were only two purchasers in the market, one representing the foreign bankers and one representing the United States; and they fixed the price and put it down.

I could go into the details of that proceeding if I had the opportunity. I repeat if that act had been executed in good faith there would have been a very different condition of things; but your party—and I believe you belong to the Cleveland, Palmer, and Buckner party—and the representative of your party, Mr. Carlisle, refused to purchase any silver; he repudiated the act finally. Though the Republican party may have made some pledge that they are not monometallists, that pledge has a string to it, and it is a very feeble string; but the Palmer and Buckner party, as I understand, is per se a gold party.

Mr. LINDSAY. I can not recall all these things, for it has been a long time since I read that debate; but I want to do the Senator from Nevada the credit to say that he did not participate in it much. My recollection is that he only asked one explanation, and that was whether the Government would be bound to buy silver. The answer was that it would, and he was satisfied. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. The Secretary of the Treasury would not buy.

Mr. LINDSAY. I understand the Senator was deceived and imposed upon; but the buying was the only thing he was particularly anxious about.

Mr. STEWART. The Treasury stopped buying.

Mr. LINDSAY. I know that.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly; I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Nevada is interested in that question, I will say that when the Democratic Administration, of which the Senator from Kentucky has been a great supporter, came into power it declared that the Government was under no obligation to buy silver, and absolutely declined to buy silver, as the Senator knows.

Mr. LINDSAY. Of course.

Mr. TELLER. One other thing I want to say. The Senator has intimated, or, I suppose, desired the public to understand, that the act of 1890 was a movement on the part of the silver representatives from the silver-producing States.

Mr. LINDSAY. No; I do not want to convey that impression.

Mr. TELLER. I did not participate very much in that branch of the debate, except to say in substance—I do not recall the exact words—thirty minutes before I voted for the bill, that it was absolutely indefensible as a money measure, but that as it would give some relief to the money condition of the country, releasing somewhere in the neighborhood of $60,000,000 which was tied up as a deposit or as a trust fund and could not be used—as it released that and left the people who had deposited it to look to the general credit of the Government, that it would afford some relief to the public, and in my judgment it would afford some relief to the people producing silver.

I declared then that it would not bring silver to par, although if the act had been properly carried out it would have helped to do that; but I expressed my dissent absolutely from the bill and voted for it under protest. That was the feeling of all the representatives of the silver States with one or two exceptions.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, I want to say that all the Senator says is absolutely accurate. He did not give his approval to the bill and he did not express the opinion that it would bring silver to par with gold.

Mr. TELLER. I said it would not.

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes; but the point I make is not that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber voted for the bill, but that they separated themselves from a unanimous Democracy, who had been fighting with them for free coinage, and every one of whom voted against the conference report.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to make another interruption?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator must know just as well as we did that it was absolutely impossible to secure a free-coinage measure. We had demonstrated that by the vote in the House of Representatives. We had the assurance of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the President of the United States that if we passed such a bill it would be vetoed, and therefore we were not fighting for free coinage longer when we knew that there was an insurmountable objection; but, believing as we did that the bill would afford some relief to the country and some relief to the depressed industries of the West, we voted for it.

I should like to say further that if I had known at that time that my Republican associates were ready to betray us and abandon us, as they afterwards declared they would at the first opportunity, I do not suppose I would have voted for the bill.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, if free coinage was then impossible—and I take it that the Senator understood it was—

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. LINDSAY. We could at least have defeated all legislation, and the Bland-Allison Act, which provided for the purchase of $2,000,000 worth of silver bullion a month and the coinage of all of it into silver money, would have remained in force.

Mr. STEWART. I beg your pardon; President Cleveland before his first inauguration insisted in the Warner letter that the Bland-Allison Act should be repealed. It was one of his main missions in life to have that act repealed, and when he came in a second time and renewed his recommendation against the Sherman Act in the same way, but for its repeal, the Bland-Allison Act would have been in his path the same as the Sherman Act was. The purpose of Mr. Cleveland was to accomplish what he failed to accomplish in his first Administration, to wit, to remove every law from the statute book which recognized silver in any way as a money metal.

If the Bland-Allison Act had remained on the statute book when he came in the second time, there is no reason why he would not have succeeded against that the same as he did against the Sherman Act. It was his constant fight. He led the Democratic party up to it and succeeded in getting enough of them to go over and join the Republican party so as to destroy silver in his second term. He repeated the same argument against the Sherman Act that he had used against the Bland-Allison Act. To reach the single gold standard was his object; and the Bland-Allison Act could not have remained on the statute book any more than the Sherman Act.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, that is no reply to my statement that if the act of 1890 had been defeated the Bland-Allison Act would have remained in force.

Mr. STEWART. It would have remained in force as long as the Sherman Act, but it could not have stood the raid of 1893.

Mr. LINDSAY. Under the Bland-Allison Act, which was repealed in 1890, and for the repeal of which the Senator from Nevada voted, during 1891, 1892, 1893, and 1894, we would have bought $2,000,000 worth of silver bullion each month and coined it into silver dollars, and put those dollars into circulation. Instead of doing that we passed the Sherman Act, which my friend says the Republicans did not faithfully carry out, under which we bought plenty of silver, but coined and put in circulation very little of it.

Mr. STEWART. If we had continued that we should have had less silver money than we have to-day.

Mr. LINDSAY. My friend can not make me defend the Republican party or defend its interpretation of the law; but the money we secured under the act of 1890 is not silver at all; that money is Treasury notes, which the Republican party insists are to be redeemed not in silver, but in gold, and then reissued and kept in circulation.

Mr. STEWART. What we complain of is that neither the Republican party nor the Democratic party have any respect for the law.

Mr. LINDSAY. The Senator knows that the Secretary of the Treasury does not intend to redeem in anything but gold.

Mr. STEWART. I beg pardon for the expression I just used. I did not mean to say the Democratic party, but I meant the Cleveland party. I want to apologize to the Democratic party.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to get into this controversy about whether the repeal of the Bland-Allison Act, so called, would have resulted in less or more money; but it is perfectly evident if the price of silver bullion had continued to decline, as it did under the Bland-Allison law and under existing legislation, that the original act of 1878 would have yielded a much larger amount of silver money than there is under existing conditions.

Mr. LINDSAY. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. STEWART. But we had no conception that you were going to play these tricks on us.

Mr. LINDSAY. I want to say to my friend from Nevada that we are proposing to legislate now with full knowledge of the fact that they will play that same trick on him again; that the one hundred and fifty millions of greenbacks will be redeemed in gold, and then reissued for further redemption in gold.

Mr. STEWART. Please do not suggest the impossible. The idea that is suggested, that any man now living can have a full knowledge of the tricks of the Cleveland Democracy and the Gold-bug Republicans, is something more than marvelous. As to the Senator's remark about legislating with full knowledge, you can not tell what statutes they will repudiate. They repudiate everything that is in their way. Then how can you tell what statutes they will repudiate? The Senator says they repudiated the statute which provided for redemption in either metal, and he says they will do as they have a mind to. But how can you have full knowledge, even if you know what law they will pass, whether it will be to their interest to repudiate it?

Mr. LINDSAY. I will confess that we do not know and can not know all they will do.

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. LINDSAY. But we do know this much: If you put these greenbacks out, they will be redeemed in gold, and you do know when they do redeem them they will again issue them, and again redeem them in gold; and you do know that if it is necessary to get the gold, they will sell bonds again under the act of 1875 to get it.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator stand by them in any such violation of the law, in selling out their country in that way?

Mr. LINDSAY. I will tell you, if you will give me an opportunity.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. LINDSAY. In 1895 a bill came over from the Republican House of Representatives proposing to sell $200,000,000 of bonds, very much like the $300,000,000 of bonds which are proposed to be sold by the minority amendment of the Finance Committee. The bill went to the Finance Committee, and that committee reported back a substitute in the nature of a bill for the free and unlimited coinage of silver. When that substitute came up for discussion, a good deal was said by the Senator from Nevada, doubtless, but I do not remember what it was.

Mr. STEWART. I was in favor of the bill of course. I was an honest man then, as I am now.

Mr. LINDSAY. The Senator was in favor of it. The argument was made that if we should go to free silver, then gold and silver would come to a parity. I took the ground if that was true—

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator will not put me in any such attitude as that. I never spent time in discussing any such question as that. What I am after is to have money on a parity with property. Other things will take care of themselves.

Mr. LINDSAY. My friends on this side of the Chamber insisted that if we should go to free coinage, gold and silver would come to a parity. My opinion was that if that was a well-founded belief—and I had no right to doubt that my silver friends thought it was—and we were going to make the experiment, there could be but one of two results. Either gold and silver would come to a parity, or else this country would go to the silver basis. Therefore I was of the opinion that in either alternative there was no propriety in selling bonds to keep up a redemption fund.

A proposition was made by the then Senator from Kansas, Mr. Peffer, looking to that view, which was rejected. Then my distinguished friend from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who is consistent always, whether right or wrong—he claims he is sometimes right—offered this amendment to that substitute:

Provided, That after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall be deprived of the power to issue bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of the Government unless Congress shall first declare the necessity therefor, any act of Congress now in force to the contrary notwithstanding.

So that with this amendment the substitute would have provided for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, with the provision that the Secretary of the Treasury should have no power to sell bonds except by express act of Congress, and then only according to that act. If there was a deep-seated, undying hostility to the sale of bonds, an opposition holding that bonds should not even be sold in time of war, it seems to me that was the time for such opposition to manifest itself.

The yeas and nays were called on the proposed amendment, and it received 21 votes. It was defeated by a vote of 54. Now, let us see who voted for it. The following Democrats voted for the amendment: BACON, BERRY, Blanchard, Call, Hill, Irby, LINDSAY, MILLER, and ROACH. Those were all the antibond-selling Democrats who were then on this side of this Chamber.

Mr. ALLEN. How about the Populists?

Mr. LINDSAY. The Populists voted for it, of course. The Populists, you know, are opposed to unnecessarily selling bonds, just as I am.

This substitute was defeated, and I find among those who did not then regard the sale of bonds as an unpardonable sin, even in time of peace, and who were willing to sell bonds, or at least not willing to take away from the Secretary of the Treasury the right to sell bonds to buy gold to redeem greenbacks, for that was what was being done under the statute then in force, the following Democrats voted in the negative: BATE, CHILTON, COCKRELL, DANIEL, FAULKNER, George, Gibson, GORMAN, GRAY, Harris, JONES of Arkansas, MARTIN, MITCHELL of Wisconsin, MORGAN, MURPHY, Palmer, PASCO, Pugh, TILLMAN, VEST, Villas, Voorhees, Walthall, and WHITE.

In 1895 three-fourths of the Democrats were opposed to repealing the act of 1875 and taking away from the President the right to sell bonds to buy coin to redeem greenbacks. Four or five of us, in conjunction with the Populists, and under the leadership of my distinguished friend from Nebraska, were in favor of taking that power away from the President.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. I do.

Mr. STEWART. I think the Senator places his Democratic friends in a false position by representing them as being opposed to the selling of bonds to buy gold for the purpose for which they were then sold. By the act of January, 1875, the resumption act, it was provided that the Secretary of the Treasury might use the money in the Treasury to redeem greenbacks, that he might sell bonds of the description named in the act of July 14, 1870, to the extent necessary to procure coin to redeem the greenbacks; but if it was not necessary for that purpose he had no such power.

The Democrats never took the position in any vote they gave that the Treasury had power to sell bonds to buy gold, or that it had the power to sell bonds to buy coin or for any other purpose than to redeem greenbacks. They were opposed, as was explained at the time, to changing the act of 1875, which was limited to selling bonds to buy coin to redeem the greenbacks. That act was construed to be an authorization to the President not only to sell bonds to buy coin, but to sell bonds to buy gold; not only to sell bonds to buy coin to redeem greenbacks, as provided in the act, but to sell bonds to buy gold for all other purposes.

Finally the act was construed to mean that the President had the power to sell bonds ad libitum, to put the proceeds in the Treasury and use the money for ordinary purposes. Over $200,000,000 were put in the Treasury and used to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government, which the Democrats contended, and we all contended, was in violation of the statute, which only authorized the issuance of bonds to the extent necessary to buy coin to redeem greenbacks. When there was coin in the Treasury there was no power to issue bonds, because there was no necessity for bonds, and there was no time when there was not an abundance of silver coin in the Treasury.

Consequently the entire issue was without authority of law. More than half of the revenue during that time came into the Treasury in silver certificates, it is true, but they were convertible in the Treasury, without the action of a third party, into silver coin; and we had always an abundance of coin on hand. So there was no necessity whatever for issuing bonds to buy coin, not even silver coin, for we always had plenty of it, and the Democrats and most of us contended that it was a gross violation of law. To construe the vote of Democracy against changing the resumption act into an indorsement of the sale of $262,000,000 of bonds to buy gold for speculative purposes is a hard reflection on your colleagues. You ought not to make it.

Mr. LINDSAY. That is exactly what I did not say.

In May, 1896, Mr. Cleveland was President, and we knew he would remain President until the 4th of March, 1897. He was selling bonds under the act of 1875 and buying gold and putting it in the Treasury and redeeming greenbacks with it, and then using the greenbacks in paying the current expenses of the Government, and it was in that view, because the Senator from Nebraska was opposed to those things being done, that he moved this amendment, which would have taken from Mr. Cleveland's Secretary and would have taken from Mr. McKinley's Secretary the power to sell bonds.

Mr. STEWART. Would it not also have taken away the power to sell bonds to buy coin if it should become necessary to redeem greenbacks? Would it not have gone further than was necessary? I have not the language before me, but my recollection of it is that it went further than to stop the glaring evil which was then and is now complained of.

Mr. LINDSAY. My friend puts the Democrats in the attitude in which I never put them; that is, they were willing for the President of the United States to have the unqualified and unrestrained power to sell bonds under the act of 1875 if he would buy silver to redeem the greenbacks.

Mr. STEWART. No; there was no necessity for that.

Mr. LINDSAY. But they were opposed—

Mr. STEWART. I beg pardon. There never was a day or an hour when there was not an abundance of silver to redeem greenbacks.

Mr. LINDSAY. If there was an abundance of silver to redeem the greenbacks—and that was my logic—and we were going to free silver, then the proposition was that there was no necessity for selling bonds to buy either gold or silver, and that therefore the right to sell bonds ought to be taken away. A great majority of the Senators on this side voted against it. That was in time of peace.

Now, then, in time of war there is opposition to selling bonds to raise money to pay the expenses of the war; but those in opposition seem willing to leave the act of 1875 in force, so that this Administration may buy gold to redeem the greenbacks, and propose that we shall increase the volume of greenbacks $150,000,000, so that we may make it necessary for the Administration to buy more gold than it otherwise would have an excuse for buying.

This is the way these propositions appear to me: One is that we shall unnecessarily, if not unconstitutionally, invade the domain of State taxation and cripple the States for the benefit of the Federal Government when there is no necessity for doing so; and the other is that we shall increase the burden resting upon the $100,000,000 of gold reserve without adding a cent to that reserve, knowing at the time that the gold speculators may use the facility this must give them to raid the Treasury and make it necessary for this Administration to sell bonds; and we know that it will sell bonds, and will sell them for gold, and will use that gold to redeem the greenbacks which are to be put in circulation and keep in circulation, no matter how often they may be redeemed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I understand the Senator, he contends that the issue of greenbacks which we favor would entail an obligation, or at least afford an opportunity to the Administration—

Mr. LINDSAY. That is better.

Mr. TILLMAN. To sell bonds for gold?

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. His substitute, or that which he proposes to vote for as a substitute, is to allow the Administration to issue bonds to carry on the war. What will it sell those bonds for when it sells them? Will it demand gold for them?

Mr. LINDSAY. Is the Senator through?

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely wish to know—

Mr. LINDSAY. I understand; but I want the Senator—

Mr. TILLMAN. I desire to know whether it will sell the bonds for greenbacks, or silver certificates, or gold?

Mr. LINDSAY. The Senator is in the habit of putting Senators upon the witness stand, and while I am willing to answer his question, I do not intend to be cross-examined.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is too good a lawyer for me to undertake to tackle him on any proposition of law, but I am simply asking him a question of policy—how will these bonds be sold? What will they bring into the Treasury that he proposes to use in order to carry on the war?

Mr. LINDSAY. The bonds will be sold for money as good as gold, exchangeable for gold, and that money will be used to pay the young men we are sending to Cuba to face Spanish bullets and the yellow fever.

Mr. TILLMAN. How will you make the money for which the bonds will be sold as good as gold?

Mr. LINDSAY. By redeeming the greenbacks in gold.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; you will make it as good as gold by selling bonds for greenbacks to carry on the war, and selling bonds for gold with which to redeem your greenbacks. I want to know how long this country will stand that or will be able to stand it if the war goes on for two or three years and if England or some continental country gets into it?

Mr. LINDSAY. The war will not go on for two or three years.

Mr. TILLMAN. Suppose it should.

Mr. LINDSAY. I said I would not be cross-examined, and I am going to stand by that statement. Whenever the Senator gets through, I will answer.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am through for the present.

Mr. LINDSAY. The war will not go on two or three years unless we break down our credit at the outset of the war, and that I am opposed to doing. We will sell bonds if it prove necessary.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator wait?

Mr. LINDSAY. No; I will not wait. The Senator can answer my speech, but I can not yield now. We will sell bonds and we will get good money for them, and our credit will be as good as gold, and we will pay our debts in money equal to gold, and at the end of the war we will have conducted it upon the very cheapest basis possible.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. I will have to decline. I can not make an argument with these constant interruptions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky declines to yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator declines to be catechized—

Mr. LINDSAY. Oh, well, I do decline to be catechized. It is not proper to catechise a Senator on the floor, and while I want to be as courteous as I can and answer any question, I can not consent to be treated as a mere witness.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am sorry the Senator draws the line at me, after having been so courteous to all the others.

Mr. LINDSAY. Other Senators asked their questions, and I will be just as courteous to the Senator, and if he thinks I have not been I will withdraw my objection. I never meant to be discourteous in the slightest degree.

I read somewhere a short time ago that England in the great wars of the early part of the century resorted to paper money akin to legal-tender notes and that at the end of the war it found itself indebted in the sum of £400,000,000, while if it had conducted the war upon a coin basis its debt would have been two hundred and sixty instead of four hundred and sixty million pounds, and that its currency, to which it resorted, doubtless, under stress of circumstances like those this Government had to deal with in 1862, had cost it a premium of $1,000,000,000, which might have been saved if it had stood by the coin standard.

England probably was forced to do it; but England paid the penalty of yielding to the necessity, just as this Government paid the penalty of yielding to the necessity in 1862. This war may go on, we may become involved with other European powers, the time may come when we can not go further on the coin basis, either of gold or silver, and when we will be compelled to come to the issuance of greenbacks and to the policy of forced loans. Should such a contingency arise, whatever our necessities demand will be done, and it will be done without complaint, and we will pay the penalty, whatever it may be. What I now protest against is that we shall provoke that state of affairs; that we shall discredit ourselves at the very outset by resorting to a forced loan, by issuing notes payable upon demand and putting no money in the Treasury to meet them when their payment shall be demanded.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see any necessity for so doing when we have committee meetings nearly every morning.

Mr. ALLISON. It is proposed all around me that we shall go into executive session this afternoon, and Senators know very well that Thursday we have a special order which will require most of the day. There are a certain number of Senators who, I know, desire to speak on the revenue bill, and who do not wish, at least I do not understand that they wish, to go on to-night. Therefore, I think we should meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and I make the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

Provided further, That officers of the Regular Army receiving commissions in regiments of engineers, or any other commissions in the Volunteer Army, shall not be held to vacate their offices in the Regular Army by accepting the same, but shall be entitled to receive only the pay and allowances of such volunteer rank while serving as such.

Mr. HAWLEY. The amendment is entirely acceptable to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I move that the Senate concur therein.

The amendment was concurred in.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 5, after the word "been," to insert "regularly;" on the same page, line 5, after the word "purposes," to insert "upon a schedule approved by the Commissioners;" on page 1, line 11, to strike out "president" and insert "directors;" and on page 2, after line 4, to insert the following as new sections:

SEC. 2. That on and after one year from the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any street-railway company operating its system or parts of its system over lines owned and operated by another street-railway company in the city of Washington to continue such operation or to enter into reciprocal trackage relations with any other company, as provided for under existing law, unless its motive power for the propulsion of its cars shall be the same as that of the company whose tracks are used or to be used. For every violation of this act the company violating it shall be subject to a fine of $10, to be collected and applied in the same manner as is provided by existing laws in respect of other fines in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendments of the House of Representatives and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. McMILLAN, Mr. PROCTOR, and Mr. FAULKNER were appointed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 24, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 4645) to provide an American register for the steamship Zealandia; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10121) to suspend the operation of certain provisions of law relating to the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 195. Joint resolution calling upon the Secretary of War for information concerning the port of Sabine Pass.

UINTAH INDIAN RESERVATION, UTAH.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1883) for the appointment of a commission to make allotments of lands in severalty to Indians upon the Uintah Reservation, in Utah, and to obtain cession to the United States of all lands within said reservation not so allotted.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission consisting of not more than three persons, who shall, with the consent of the Indians properly residing on the Uintah Indian Reservation in Utah, allot in severalty to the said Indians, and to such of the Uncompahgre Indians as may not be able to obtain allotments within the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, agricultural and grazing lands, as follows: To each head of a family, one-quarter of a section, with an additional quantity of grazing land not exceeding one-quarter of a section; to each single person over 18 years of age, one-eighth of a section, with an additional quantity of grazing land not exceeding one-eighth of a section; to each orphan child under 18 years of age, one-eighth of a section, with an additional quantity of grazing land not exceeding one-eighth of a section; to each person under 18 years of age born prior to such allotment, one-eighth of a section, with a like quantity of grazing land: Provided, That with the consent of said commission any adult Indian may select a less quantity of land, if more desirable on account of location.

All necessary surveys to enable said commission to complete the allotments shall be made under the direction of the General Land Office.

SEC. 2. That said commission shall also obtain, by the consent of a majority of the adult male Indians properly residing upon and having an interest in the said Uintah Indian Reservation, the cession to the United States of all the lands within said reservation not allotted or needed for allotment as aforesaid. The agreement for such cession shall be reported by said commission and become operative when ratified by act of Congress; and thereupon such ceded lands shall be subject to entry under the general land laws of the United States, or to selection by the State of Utah as provided by law to satisfy the land grants made to said State. Mineral lands therein shall be subject to entry under the mineral land laws.

SEC. 3. That said commissioners shall receive $6 per day each, and their actual and necessary traveling and incidental expenses while on duty, and to be allowed a clerk to be selected by them, whose compensation shall be fixed by said commissioners, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the cost of executing the provisions of this act shall not exceed the sum of $25,000, which sum is hereby appropriated for that purpose out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs, were read:

In line 4, page 1, after the word "commission," strike out the word "of" and insert "consisting of not more than."

Strike out lines 12 and 13, on page 2, section 2.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to know whether the provision in the bill regarding the right to the mineral lands takes in the gilsonite lands?

Mr. KING. It does not. It relates to an entirely different reservation. The Uncompahgre Reservation contains the gilsonite which has provoked so much discussion in the past.

Mr. SULZER. It does nothing about the gilsonite lands? I want to be sure about that matter.

Mr. KING. Absolutely nothing. It relates to the Uintah Reservation, an entirely different one from the Uncompahgre Reservation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to ask a question. There is a provision in the bill, as I understood it, that all mineral lands may be entered under the mineral-land laws.

Mr. KING. That is the provision as the bill was passed by the Senate. The House committee have recommended an amendment striking that out, and I was just about to move the adoption of the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I thought I understood it to be read, and I was opposed to the provision as read.

Mr. KING. I was just about to move the adoption of the committee amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I ask the gentleman from Utah a question?

Mr. KING. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood, as the bill was read, that the commission was to consist of three persons. My understanding was that we reported against that.

Mr. KING. No; the amendment recommended by the House committee, at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior, was for a commission consisting of "not more than three." The Secretary, as I understand, thought one commissioner might perform the work. I am willing, if the chairman of the committee desires, that it shall be so amended as to permit the appointment of but one commissioner.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all right, if it is "not more than three."

Mr. DOCKERY. Has this bill been passed upon by a committee of this House?

Mr. KING. It has.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. Before consent is given, I understand the gentleman proposes to modify this bill in accordance with a similar bill that passed the House a few days ago, providing that nothing shall be paid from the Treasury, but that there shall be paid to the Indians whatever may be received from the sale of the lands, and that the same shall be held in trust for the Indians.

Mr. KING. The gentleman states the position correctly, and I shall offer an amendment directly which I submitted to him, covering that point.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do I understand that the mineral lands are exempt entirely by this bill?

Mr. KING. The mineral lands are not referred to in this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What was it that the Clerk read?

Mr. KING. That is to be stricken out by recommendation of the House committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, may the amendments be again reported?

The amendments were again reported.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. What effect, if any, will the bill have on the mineral lands, no reference having been made to them?

Mr. KING. In reply to the gentleman, I will state that the mineral lands are not affected at all. This commission, which is to be appointed by the President, will consist of not more than three persons, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Indians having interests in the Uintah Reservation are willing to cede to the Government the lands therein (not needed by the Indians under the allotment provisions), to be held in trust by the United States and sold to citizens thereof, the proceeds of such sales to be devoted to the use and benefit of the Indians.

Mr. DOCKERY. But if there were mineral lands on the reservation, the bill making no reference whatever to them, I assume that they would be entered under the mineral-land laws of the United States.

Mr. KING. It depends entirely upon the agreement made between the Indians and the Commissioner and the subsequent action of Congress. If the Indians should withhold the whole of the mineral lands, the title would remain in the Indians. If they should cede them to the Government without any restriction whatever, and if Congress ratified the cession, the lands would vest in the Government, subject to any restrictions imposed in the treaty.

Mr. DOCKERY. Are there, in fact, any mineral lands on the reservation?

Mr. KING. I have been on the reservation, and have not discovered any; but the Secretary of the Interior advised me a few days ago that a little mineral had been found there. And I have no doubt but that the mountains contain some minerals, whether in paying quantities or not I am unable to state.

Mr. BARTHOLOTT. Do I understand that this refers to the Uintah Reservation alone, or to the Uintah and Uncompahgre Reservation?

Mr. KING. This refers to the Uintah Reservation alone. It does not concern the Uncompahgre Reservation.

Mr. LACEY. What mineral was discovered on the northeast corner?

Mr. KING. Elaterite.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman for what this land is principally desired.

Mr. KING. There is considerable agricultural land on the reservation, and there is some interest manifested in this bill by persons desiring homes thereon. There is a great deal of grazing land on the reservation—lands that can be utilized only for grazing purposes.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. You say that the parties desiring to have the reservation opened are citizens of Utah who want homes on it?

Mr. KING. Citizens of Utah, Colorado, and surrounding States and Territories.

Mr. GAINES. What do you do with the gilsonite?

Mr. KING. There is no gilsonite on this land, so far as I know.

Mr. TALBERT. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. This provides for the appointment of a commission?

Mr. KING. Of not more than three.

Mr. TALBERT. Does it carry any appropriation to pay the commission?

Mr. KING. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. TALBERT. And that is all there is of it?

Mr. KING. That is all that it provides for.

I desire to offer, pursuant to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine, the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2, pages 2 and 3, by striking out all after the word "be," in line 24, on page 2, down to and including the word "laws," in line 3, page 3, and insert the following:

"Held in trust by the United States for the purpose of sale to citizens thereof: Provided, That the United States shall pay no sum or amount whatever for said lands so ceded. Said lands shall be sold in such manner and in such quantities and for such prices as may be determined by Congress: Provided, That the amount so received shall in the aggregate be sufficient to pay said Indians in full the amount agreed upon for said lands. All sums received from the sales of said lands shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States for said Indians, and shall be exclusively devoted to the use and benefit of the Indians having interest in the lands so ceded."

Mr. KING. I call for a vote on the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KING, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RETURN OF CONFERENCE REPORT TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request of the Senate; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, May 23, 1898.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the conference report on House bill 10121, to suspend the operations of certain provisions of law relating to the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and for other purposes.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS—REVIEW OF WORLD'S COMMERCE.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the following resolution from the Committee on Printing, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to print for distribution by the Department of State 5,000 copies of Commercial Relations, 1896-97, and (in separate form) 10,000 copies of the Review of the World's Commerce, etc., being part of said Commercial Relations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ODELL rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. PERKINS. Also the following resolution, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is it a privileged resolution?

Mr. PERKINS. It is not.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman will be recognized later.

RETENTION OF FOLDERS.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask for its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House is hereby authorized to retain upon the rolls as employees until the beginning of the second session of the Fifty-fifth Congress in December, 1898, the eight additional folders in the folding room of the House provided for in a resolution of the House dated January 17, 1898, said employees to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the same rate as they are now receiving.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

In line 3, strike out the word "second" and insert in lieu thereof the word "third."

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York whether this is the usual resolution—whether it has been customary to retain these officials until the beginning of the ensuing session?

Mr. ODELL. It is necessary now, because they are dumping into the folding room 500,000 speeches a week, and it is important for them to take care of them, and they must have the necessary force.

Mr. DOCKERY. My impression was that it was customary to retain them for only ninety days.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Committee on Accounts cut down the folders from 15 to 8, and this makes it less than the usual number. They used to have over twice as many, and this resolution provides for about half the number, so it is a saving to the Government.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ODELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

DONATION OF A CONDEMNED CANNON TO THE NATIONAL ENCAMPMENT, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution 271, donating a condemned cannon to the Thirty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to deliver to the order of William B. Melish, executive director of the Thirty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, one dismounted condemned cannon, used in the late civil war, to be used for the purpose of furnishing memorial badges commemorative of the holding of such encampment at Cincinnati, Ohio: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States through the delivery of said condemned cannon.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, for a number of years past, to each grand encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic it has been customary for the United States Government to donate a cannon used in the late war, to be melted up into memorial badges to be distributed among the soldiers who attend the encampment. A similar resolution was passed for the encampment at Buffalo, and I have the assurance of the Chief of Ordnance that he will be able to furnish such a cannon without expense to the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Can you not get it under the general law?

Mr. BROMWELL. No; I am told not.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BROMWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

GRANT OF CERTAIN LANDS TO SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

Mr. BARLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 9554, granting certain lands to the city of Santa Barbara, Cal.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill granting certain lands to the city of Santa Barbara, Cal.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following-described tracts of land, situate in the county of Santa Barbara and State of California, described as follows: East half of southwest quarter, and northeast quarter, and west half of southwest quarter and west half of northwest quarter of section 25; northeast quarter, and east half southeast quarter and southwest quarter of southeast quarter, and north half of northwest quarter, and northwest quarter of southwest quarter, of section 26; northeast quarter of southeast quarter and west half of southeast quarter, and northeast quarter, and north half of northwest quarter and southeast quarter of northwest quarter, and east half of southwest quarter and northwest quarter of southwest quarter, of section 27; sections 22 and 23; east half and southwest quarter and northwest quarter of northeast quarter, of section 24; all of the above subdivisions located in township 5 north, range 7 west, San Bernardino meridian, containing 3,120 acres, more or less, be, and the same is hereby, granted and conveyed to the city of Santa Barbara, in the county of Santa Barbara and State of California, to have and to hold said lands to its use and behoof forever, for the purpose of developing a water supply; and for said purpose the city shall forever have the right, in its discretion, to control and use any and all parts of the premises herein conveyed in the construction of reservoirs, laying such pipes and mains, tunneling and boring for water, and in making such improvements as may be necessary to utilize the waters developed upon said premises.

SEC. 2. That if the city of Santa Barbara shall, at any time after commencing the development of water on the lands described in section 1 of this act, abandon the same or cease to use the same for the purposes of developing a water supply, the land herein described shall revert to the Government of the United States. The survey of the lands so granted shall be made under the direction and approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before giving consent, Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear some explanation from the gentleman from California.

Mr. BARLOW. I will ask that the report of the committee be read, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The House ought especially to be in order during the reading of these matters, because they require the assent of every member.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9554) granting certain lands to the city of Santa Barbara, Cal., have had the same under consideration and submit the following report:

This bill provides for the conveyance of 3,120 acres of the public domain, or so much thereof as may be selected, located in the Santa Ynez Mountains, to the city of Santa Barbara, Cal., to be paid for by said city when selected at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

This bill was introduced at the request of the municipal government and the commercial organizations of the city by a petition in which it was shown that the present water supply of the city was wholly inadequate to the needs of the people, and that their dependence is in developing water from tunnels in the land owned by the National Government in township 5 north, of range 27 west, of the San Bernardino meridian.

It was shown that this land is wholly of a rugged and barren character, unfit for grazing, agriculture, mineral, or timber location, and while of no value for any of these purposes, may become, if water can be developed, of great value to Santa Barbara.

The objects for which this grant is asked are threefold:

First. To secure locations for driving tunnels into the mountains in order to develop, if possible, a municipal water supply.

Second. To preserve the purity of such water supply when developed.

Third. To protect from depredations and fires the growth of brush now partially covering the watershed, from which the supply of water for the city is and must be drawn, and thereby preserving the supply itself.

It has been the policy of the Government to protect the water supply of cities by legislation authorizing the purchase by cities of lands for these purposes, or by donation of land, or by exercising the Executive power creating forest reserves where such action has been necessary.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office has reported that the records of his office show the land described in the bill to be vacant and unappropriated, and that this legislation meets with his hearty approval.

The Department of the Interior suggests some amendments as to the description of the lands, which have been adopted by the committee.

The committee recommends that the bill do pass with the following amendments:

In line 5, page 1, strike out the word "southwest" and insert in lieu thereof the word "southeast."

In line 1, page 2, strike out the word "east" and insert in lieu thereof the word "west."

And in line 1, page 2, strike out the word "southwest" and insert in lieu thereof the word "southeast."

In line 5, page 2, after the word "acres," insert the following words: "or so much thereof as said city may select."

In line 6, page 2, strike out the word "in" and insert in lieu thereof the word "are," and at the end of the first section add the following:

"Provided, That said city shall pay for said lands so selected the sum of $1.25 per acre."

And it is further amended by striking out all of section 2 of said bill.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARLOW, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL HOSPITAL STEWARDS.

Mr. HULL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk—a Senate bill which the House Committee on Military Affairs has reported with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4556) to suspend certain provisions of law relating to hospital stewards in the United States Army, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all provisions of law limiting the number of hospital stewards in service at any one time to 100, and requiring that a person to be appointed a hospital steward shall first demonstrate his fitness therefor by actual service of not less than twelve months as acting hospital steward, and that limit the amount to be expended for the pay of civil employees in the Medical Department of the Army in one year to $40,000, be, and the same are hereby, suspended during the existing war.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following:

"Provided, That the increase of hospital stewards under this act shall not exceed 100."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill, and especially whether it proposes any permanent increase in the number of hospital stewards.

Mr. HULL. This does not provide for a permanent increase. In our appropriation bills we have gradually cut down the number of hospital stewards in the Regular Army until the last reduction made the number 100. Under the existing law the Department has no power to appoint hospital stewards beyond that number. While our troops are at posts and gradually being consolidated 100 hospital stewards would be sufficient; but the troops are now largely being taken from the posts, while enough troops are left to require hospital stewards to remain at most of the posts. Hence the troops in the field are not sufficiently provided with hospital stewards, because under the law governing the Regular Army none can be appointed in excess of 100. This is a matter which affects the health of the troops, and the increase proposed in the bill is necessary.

The amendment reported by our committee provides that the increase of hospital stewards under this act shall not exceed 100. When the bill was before our committee the question was raised, How much of an increase would be made? Most of the members of the committee believed that the increase would greatly exceed 100 unless some limitation were inserted. In our volunteer forces a hospital steward is provided for each battalion. In the Regular Army hospital stewards are not assigned to regiments, but are used wherever the necessities of the service may require. The Surgeon-General telegraphed us in answer to our inquiry that an increase of 100 would be enough, he thought, under all circumstances; so we placed this limitation in the bill.

Mr. RIDGELY. Does this measure affect the volunteer service at all?

Mr. HULL. Not at all; it applies only to the Regular Army.

Mr. DOCKERY. In view of the facts presented, would it not be wise to put a limitation on the amount to be expended for civilian employees? As the law now stands, I believe the limitation is $40,000.

Mr. HULL. In order to arrive at such a limitation it would be necessary to figure out the total increase of civilian employees so far as these hospital stewards are concerned.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not talking about the hospital stewards especially.

Mr. HULL. Well, they are civilians partially. These new appointees will be selected outside of those who have served a year in the Army as hospital stewards. These hospital stewards for temporary purposes will be selected from the apothecaries and pharmacists of the country.

Mr. DOCKERY. The main proposition of this bill is undoubtedly a correct one; but I thought there was another proposition.

Mr. HULL. There is a proposition to suspend the limitation as to the amount that can be paid to civilian employees. But unless we can get at the number of civilian employees that may be put in these temporary places, we can not well adopt any limitation as to the amount. I do not conceive that there is any very great danger of extravagance in that direction.

Mr. DOCKERY. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the present law, as recited in the bill, limits the amount that may be expended for civilian employees to $40,000.

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. HULL. The appropriation for the Medical Department is, I think, in three or four different items. The appropriation for hospitals is, I think, $75,000, and for barracks and quarters, $100,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. In the event the limitation is taken off, what appropriation would be available?

Mr. HULL. I suppose there would have to be a deficiency appropriation, because there is no appropriation now available.

Mr. DOCKERY. None at all?

Mr. HULL. None at all, except the insufficient one already made.

Mr. DOCKERY. So that the question will have to come before the Committee on Appropriations, in connection with a deficiency appropriation?

Mr. HULL. There will have to be an estimate for a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. DOCKERY. In view of the gentleman's statement, I do not insist on my suggestion.

Mr. CLARDY. Is the salary of this class of employees fixed by law?

Mr. HULL. Yes. I think they get from $35 to $50 a month. There is no objection on the part of any member of the committee to this measure.

Mr. TALBERT. As I understand, this bill, if passed, is to continue in force only during the existence of hostilities?

Mr. HULL. That is all.

Mr. TALBERT. And at the end of the war the regulations now in force would again obtain?

Mr. HULL. This bill simply suspends the existing law during the continuance of the war. Immediately on the close of hostilities the suspension would cease to operate, and the limitation to 100 would again take effect.

Mr. TALBERT. And the regulations now existing would again obtain?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir; absolutely.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SUMMARY MILITARY COURTS.

Mr. GRIFFIN. On behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I send to the desk. Before the Clerk reports the bill I desire to say that a bill on this subject—House bill 3039—was reported by our committee in January last. Since that time the conditions to which the bill was intended to apply have changed; and the legal department of the Army has discovered that that bill did not cover all the cases which it was desirable should be embraced within its provisions. Therefore I send up a bill introduced and reported by the Committee on Military Affairs this morning, as a substitute for the one reported in January, and ask to have that latter bill read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill. It requires unanimous consent.

The bill (H. R. 10423) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the administration of justice in the Army," approved October 1, 1890, and for other purposes, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to promote the administration of justice in the Army," approved October 1, 1890, as supplemented and amended by subsequent legislation, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That the commanding officer of each garrison, fort, or other place, regiment or corps, detached battalion, or company, or other detachment in the Army, shall have power to appoint for such place or command, or in his discretion for each battalion thereof, a summary court to consist of one officer to be designated by him, before whom enlisted men who are to be tried for offenses, such as were prior to the passage of the act 'to promote the administration of justice in the Army,' approved October 1, 1890, cognizable by garrison or regimental courts-martial, and offenses cognizable by field officers detailed to try offenders under the provisions of the eightieth and one hundred and tenth articles of war, shall be brought to trial within twenty-four hours of the time of the arrest, or as soon thereafter as practicable, except when the accused is to be tried by general court-martial; but such summary court may be appointed and the officer designated by superior authority when by him deemed desirable; and the officer holding the summary court shall have power to administer oaths and to hear and determine such cases, and when satisfied of the guilt of the accused adjudge the punishment to be inflicted, which said punishment shall not exceed confinement at hard labor for one month and forfeiture of one month's pay, and, in the case of a noncommissioned officer, reduction to the ranks. In addition thereto: that there shall be a summary court record kept at each military post and in the field at the headquarters of the proper command, in which shall be entered a record of all cases heard and determined and the action had thereon; and no sentence adjudged by said summary court shall be executed until it shall have been approved by the officer appointing the court, or by the officer commanding for the time being: Provided, That when but one commissioned officer is present with a command he shall hear and finally determine such cases: And provided further, That no one while holding the privileges of a certificate of eligibility to promotion shall be brought before a summary court, and that noncommissioned officers shall not, if they object thereto, be brought to trial before summary courts without the authority of the officer competent to order their trial by general court-martial, but shall in such cases be brought to trial before garrison, regimental, or general courts-martial, as the case may be."

SEC. 2. That articles 80 and 110 of the Rules and Articles for the Government of the Armies of the United States be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 3. That the commanding officers authorized to approve the sentences of summary courts and superior authority shall have power to remit or mitigate the same.

SEC. 4. That post and other commanders shall, in time of peace, on the last day of each month, make a report to the department headquarters of the number of cases determined by summary court during the month, setting forth the offenses committed and the penalties awarded, which report shall be filed in the office of the judge-advocate of the department, and may be destroyed when no longer of use.

SEC. 5. That soldiers sentenced by court-martial to dishonorable discharge and confinement shall, until discharged from such confinement, remain subject to the Articles of War and other laws relating to the administration of military justice.

SEC. 6. That it shall be lawful for any civil officer having authority under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, or District, to arrest offenders, to summarily arrest a deserter from the military service of the United States and deliver him into the custody of the military authority of the General Government.

SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect sixty days after its passage.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin explain wherein this bill goes further than the present law?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before the question is put, I should like to have the gentleman explain the features wherein this bill goes further than the present law, and the necessity of its going further than the present law.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, by the existing law there are three conditions under which summary courts may be convened and act. They are, first, where there is a line officer second in command; second, at a station where only staff officers are on duty; third, where but one commissioned officer is present with the command. Those are the three cases most prominent in which a summary court may be called upon to act. The cases not provided for, which seem to be equally necessary, are the following; and I may say that the difficulty all arises because of the number, or rather lack of number, of commissioned officers at regimental posts and battalion stations or isolated commands. Now, the first case in which they can not have a summary court is at a command with which there is present a line officer in command, because the law says "a line officer second to the officer in command."

In this case there may be a line officer present, and a staff officer, that is to say, a detached command, with one line officer and a surgeon. In a case of that kind, under the existing law, there could be no one designated to serve as a summary court to try minor military offenses. Another case is where the command is under a staff officer, and where there is one and only one line officer on duty, no summary court can be convened. These two classes are not very dissimilar to those which are provided for. In fact, all the considerations which apply to those that are provided for apply to this class of cases.

Another case is that it has been found, under the statute of 1890, undesirable that certain designated officers should constitute a court, whether they are qualified or not, and the bill which has been read is designed to correct those errors and omissions. Generally speaking, the law which passed in 1890 was designed to reach only minor offenses against military law, and, in the interest of the enlisted man, it was prompted by such conditions as these: An offense may be committed and the requisite number of regimental officers may not be at hand to constitute a regimental court. There may not be enough officers at a post to constitute a court. The result was, prior to that time, that a soldier committing a minor offense had to be more than doubly punished because of the delay after the commission of the offense, and after he had been arrested and placed in confinement—the delay in organizing a court because of the want of a sufficient number of officers.

This, taken in consideration with the fact that oftentimes the minimum penalty is fixed, prohibited the court-martial in its sentence from taking into consideration the anterior confinement of the soldier, although such arrest and confinement may have covered a much greater period of time than the time for which he might be sentenced by the judgment of that court. Now, this is a humane provision, which was prompted solely by that consideration and the desire to have a speedy disposition of cases of this character.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The provisions of this bill apply, then, solely to minor offenses?

Mr. GRIFFIN. To minor offenses. I will say, in response to the gentleman's question, that the punishment can only be thirty days' confinement or the forfeiture of a month's pay; or, in the case of a noncommissioned officer, his reduction to the ranks. Furthermore, under the present bill a noncommissioned officer is not obliged, if he objects, to go before this summary court for trial. The law as it exists at present gives the private soldier, the enlisted man, the right to object to a trial before the summary court. It has been found in the execution of the law that this operated badly, and, in fact, almost defeated the benefits which were expected to result from the establishment of a summary court.

In the present bill we propose that that right shall not exist, in view of the fact that the punishment is so small and so inconsiderable that it is better for the discipline of the Army that the soldier should receive his sentence and serve out his time, if that should be the sentence, or pay the fine or forfeiture at once.

Mr. BLAND. As I understand the bill, it authorizes civil officers to arrest a soldier. Does that change the present law?

Mr. GRIFFIN. It does not. Any officer authorized by the laws of the United States or of any State to apprehend offenders has a right under this bill and under the existing law to arrest a deserter. That is only in desertion cases. He has the right to arrest him and turn him over to the nearest military post or authority.

Now, I will say further, Mr. Speaker, that the reason why the recent bill is taken up for consideration in preference to the one reported on January 22 is this: That bill did not anticipate a state of war, and limited its operations to a state of peace. The conditions which have since come up have developed the necessity for having such a court in time of war. Now, for the purpose of officering the volunteer command and serving on the staff of the general officers that have been recently commissioned, there are many instances where they have not sufficient officers left to constitute even a summary court to enforce the discipline of the Army.

Mr. Speaker, unless there be some other gentlemen who desire an explanation with reference to the measure, I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRIFFIN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION, WASH.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have a conference report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4108) entitled "An act granting to the Washington Improvement and Development Company a right of way through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do hereby recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 3, and 4, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 2.

J. S. SHERMAN,

I. F. FISCHER,

E. B. LEWIS,

Managers on the part of the House.

GEO. L. SHoup,

JNO. L. WILSON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the statement of the House conferees.

The statement of the managers on the part of the House was read, as follows:

The Senate recedes from its disagreement to amendments numbered 1, 3, and 4, and concurs in the same. These amendments lessen the rights granted to the railway, and lessen the time within which the railroad shall be constructed.

The House recedes from the amendment numbered 2. The corporation to which this right of way is granted is a corporation created under the laws of the State of Washington. The proposed amendment might appropriately be a limitation in the charter, but it is not feasible as a proviso in this act.

The conference report was agreed to.

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF MAPS, ETC.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The bill (S. 4072) to amend "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 73, page 620, of volume 28, United States Statutes at Large, be amended as follows: In line 3, page 621, after the word "exceed," strike out "ten" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the last clause read: "but on the order of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates not to exceed 25 copies to each may be distributed through the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey."

After this clause insert the following:
"All moneys which may be received from the sale of charts and maps shall be paid by the said Superintendent into the Treasury of the United States, to be used in the further preparation and publication of such charts and maps as may be necessary to supply the public demand."

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman explain this bill?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. Reserving the right to object—

The SPEAKER. The right is reserved.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, this bill simply provides in the first place for an increase of the number of maps that may be placed by the Coast and Geodetic Survey to the credit of Members and Senators. In the second place, it provides that moneys received from the sale of maps by the Coast and Geodetic Survey may be used during the year in providing additional maps, as the public use may demand.

Mr. DOCKERY. I concur in the first proposition, but it seems to me that the second proposition is a departure from the policy which has uniformly prevailed, which is to make specific appropriations. As I understand, they may sell maps and then use the money for the printing of other maps.

Mr. PERKINS. No; the money is put into the Treasury, but that amount may be used in a public exigency for the production of additional maps during the year. The same provision is in the law for the Hydrographic Office, and the Coast and Geodetic Survey ask to be placed upon the same footing with the Hydrographic Office.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is a good measure.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, the gentleman will remember that we have uniformly pursued the policy of covering receipts into the Treasury and making specific appropriations. The gentleman remembers that a few years ago the Public Printer was authorized to use the proceeds of the office; but Congress very wisely covered in all the proceeds—

Mr. PERKINS. That is a very different matter.

Mr. DOCKERY (continuing). And made specific appropriations. On yesterday we passed a bill covering receipts arising from fees paid into the bureau of steam engineers of the District into the Treasury and making specific appropriations.

Mr. PERKINS. But just at such a time as this there are extraordinary demands made for the maps of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and this makes provision by which that demand can be supplied.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I think the policy is a very bad one. Though it may obtain in the Hydrographic Bureau, I do not see any reason for extending it. I think whenever any public money comes into the hands of an officer, it ought to be transmitted immediately to the Treasury, and it should not come out of the Treasury unless in pursuance of an act of Congress. I shall object to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion.

Mr. BLAND. I withdraw it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I have some important measures which will take a very short time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the motion.

AUXILIARY NAVAL FORCE.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I call up from the Speaker's table House joint resolution 257, providing for the organization and enrollment of the United States auxiliary naval force for coast defense.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That a United States auxiliary naval force for coast defense is hereby authorized to be established, to be enrolled in such numbers as the President may deem necessary, for the exigencies of the present war with Spain, and to serve for a period of one year, or less, and shall be disbanded by the President at the conclusion of the war.

SEC. 2. That the chief of the United States auxiliary naval force shall be detailed by the Secretary of the Navy from the active or retired list of the line officers of the Navy not below the grade of captain, who shall receive the highest pay of his grade while so employed.

SEC. 3. That enlistment into the United States auxiliary naval force shall be made by such officer or officers as the Navy Department may detail for the purpose, who shall also select from merchant vessels and other available sources such volunteers as may be deemed best fitted for service as officers in said force, and shall report to the Secretary of the Navy, for his action, their names and the grade for which each is recommended.

SEC. 4. That for the purposes of this organization the coast line shall be divided into districts, each of which shall be in charge of an assistant to the chief of the United States auxiliary naval force; and such assistant chiefs may be detailed by the Secretary of the Navy from the officers of the active or retired list of the line of the Navy, or appointed by him from civil life, not above the rank of lieutenant-commander.

SEC. 5. That the officers and men comprising the United States auxiliary naval force shall receive the same pay and emoluments as those holding similar rank or rate in the Regular Navy; and all matters relating to the organization, discipline, and government of men in said force shall conform to the laws and regulations governing the United States Navy.

SEC. 6. That the chief of the United States auxiliary naval force, or such officers as the Navy Department may detail for such service, may, with the consent of the governor of any State, muster into the said force the whole or any part of the organizations of the Naval Militia of any State to serve in said auxiliary naval force, and shall report to the Secretary of the Navy, for his action, the names and grades for which commissions in said United States auxiliary naval force shall be issued to the officers of such Naval Militia, and shall have the power to appoint and disrate the petty officers thereof.

SEC. 7. That the officers, warrant officers, petty officers, and enlisted men and boys of the United States auxiliary naval force thus created shall be paid from the appropriation "Pay of the Navy;" and said force shall constitute the inner line of defense; and the sum of $4,000,000, or so much thereof as may be required, is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase or hire of vessels necessary for the purposes of this resolution.

The Senate amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after "necessary," insert "not exceeding 3,000 enlisted men."

Page 3, lines 10 and 11, strike out "and said force shall constitute the inner line of defense."

Page 3, line 11, strike out "four" and insert "three."

Amend the title so as to read:
"Joint resolution providing for the organization and enrollment of the United States auxiliary naval force."

Mr. DOCKERY. I will ask the Clerk to read the paragraphs as they will read when amended.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I can state that to the gentleman more understandably.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask the Clerk to read the paragraphs as they will read when amended.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. This measure has been considered fully in the Committee of the Whole House, and the whole purport of the Senate amendments, I will state to the gentleman from Missouri—I will state it so that everybody else will understand it.

Mr. DOCKERY. The remark of the gentleman is entirely gratuitous and unnecessary.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. While you are reading it I will state it so that other members may be able to understand me.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The Senate amendments—

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman has raised a very debatable question.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I shall be very glad to hear the gentleman. The amendments to this bill are three Senate amendments. The first is to strike out the words "for coast defense" and leave the title of the bill for a coast patrol—auxiliary coast patrol. The second is a limitation upon the power of the President to enlist men, and instead of leaving it unlimited it confines the enlistment at 3,000 men. The third amendment is a reduction in the appropriation for the hire or purchase of vessels for this inner line or patrol from $4,000,000 to $3,000,000. Mr. Speaker, I ask the adoption of the Senate amendments.

The question was taken; and the Senate amendments were concurred in.

HOSPITAL CORPS OF UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 10220) to organize a hospital corps of the Navy of the United States, to define its duties, and regulate its pay.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a hospital corps of the United States Navy is hereby established, and shall consist of pharmacists, hospital stewards, hospital apprentices (first class), and hospital apprentices; and for this purpose the Secretary of the Navy is empowered to appoint twenty-five pharmacists with the rank, pay, and privileges of warrant officers, and to enlist, or cause to be enlisted, as many hospital stewards, hospital apprentices (first class), and hospital apprentices as in his judgment may be necessary, and to limit or fix the number, and to make such regulations as may be required for their enlistment and government. Enlisted men in the Navy or the Marine Corps shall be eligible for transfer to the hospital corps, and vacancies occurring in the grade of pharmacist shall be filled by the Secretary of the Navy by selection from those holding the rate of hospital steward.

SEC. 2. That all necessary hospital and ambulance service at naval hospitals, naval stations, navy-yards, and marine barracks, and on vessels of the Navy, Coast Survey, and Fish Commission, shall be performed by the members of said corps, and the corps shall be permanently attached to the Medical Department of the Navy, and shall be included in the effective strength of the Navy and be counted as a part of the enlisted force provided by law, and shall be subject to the laws and regulations for the government of the Navy.

SEC. 3. That the pay of hospital stewards shall be $20 a month, the pay of hospital apprentices (first class) $24 a month, and the pay of hospital apprentices $18 a month, with the increase on account of length of service as is now or may hereafter be allowed by law to other enlisted men in the Navy.

SEC. 4. That all benefits derived from existing laws, or that may hereafter be allowed by law, to other warrant officers or enlisted men in the Navy shall be allowed in the same manner to the warrant officers or enlisted men in the hospital corps of the Navy.

SEC. 5. That all acts and parts of acts, so far as they conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, when this measure was brought up before the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] desired some further time to examine into the matter. The only point that was raised during the discussion was that it authorized the Secretary to enlist or cause to be enlisted as many hospital apprentices, etc., as in his judgment might be necessary. There was some feeling that this was giving an unusual authority and it might have some effect of unduly enlarging the corps. I desire to say upon that point that this does not add in the slightest degree to the power of the Secretary of the Navy to give ratings either in the Medical Corps or either of the other corps to the enlisted men.

All of these appointments have to be made from the others. And then the number of enlisted men—of course the number of petty officers and warrant officers are rated from the body of enlisted men—depends upon the number of vessels very largely and upon the circumstances; and the Secretary of the Navy has always been vested, and necessarily so, with authority to rate as many petty officers, and such subordinate assignments as these, as are necessary to the exigencies of the service. So that this involves, necessarily, no increase in the number and no increase of authority, as I said when the bill was up before. This is essentially a reorganization of the Hospital Corps of the service, which hitherto has been very inefficient in system in the Navy. It has been based upon a system which has been tried and found very successful in the Army.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does not this bill increase the pay of the officers?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It makes a slight increase in the pay, the aggregate amount being something like $11,000 a year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why should the pay of these officers be increased at this time?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Because it is desirable to get a superior class of men. The original bill provided that the pay of the hospital apprentices should be $24 a month of the first class and $18 a month for the second class, but the Surgeon-General has called my attention since to the slowness of the enlistment and the desirability of increasing this wage rate sufficiently to enable them to get more quickly the men they desire.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think we ought at this time to increase the wages of these officers.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Perhaps the gentleman does not fully understand that the wages that are paid to the petty officers of the Navy have always been determined by the Department.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But you are determining by this bill to increase it from what it is now.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. This limits the amount to that rating, whereas the Department may make a rate of pay much exceeding this if they find the exigencies of the service require it, unless the limitation is put in here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In view of the fact that the country is being taxed by unusual and extraordinary expenses, I do not think we ought to increase the pay of these officers at this time.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Well, it is the privilege of any member to take exception to any part of this bill or to place his own judgment about a matter of that kind against the judgment of officers who are carrying on the war now in progress. For myself, I feel under obligations to pay the very greatest deference to the recommendations made to me, and the representations made to me, in the statement which I published in full the other day, and which I hope the gentleman has read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I wish the gentleman had read it, because I think it would have been useful information to him. It contained the statement of the Surgeon-General of the Navy as to the necessity for making this provision to care for the large number of sick and wounded men who may be thrown upon our hands at any time. This bill is for the purpose of taking care of the sick and wounded of the Navy whenever we may meet with a disaster or severe loss. As I stated before, while we are expanding our expenses inevitably in every direction, this reorganization of the hospital force of the Navy is to enable our surgeons to take efficient care of the sick and wounded and involves an additional expense altogether of $11,000 a year, and I confidently ask this House to make this increase, in order to provide what the Secretary of the Navy and the Surgeon-General of the Navy and the consensus of the judgment of those responsible for the care of our Navy say is necessary and ask the Congress of the United States to provide for, and not to longer delay.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that if the pay is cut down to the usual amount I have no objection to the general features of the bill, but I can not vote for this extra charge of $11,000 a year; or, if he will amend it so that it will apply only to the existing war, I will not object.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Why should we?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think we should increase the salary of anybody at this time.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Are we not increasing the force in the Navy?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not increasing the general force that I object to. Of course you have to make an increase in that, but I understand your bill increases the pay of each individual man?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. At the request of the Surgeon-General of the Navy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I see no reason for doing that.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. This is a different classification. It is the belief of the Surgeon-General of the Navy that it is necessary to increase the pay from $20 to $24 a month in order to get a better class of service. I have waived my opinion in favor of his that it is necessary that we should get a better class of men. I do not think a dollar a day is an excessive rate of wages. I can not afford to stand up here and cheese-pare or delay for a dollar a day the payment of men for that devotion which is necessary to insure to our wounded and sick sailors the solicitous care they ought to have. This is a poor place to make a cut down.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman again that if he will limit his bill to the present war, I will not object to it.

Mr. GAINES. There ought to be a larger increase in the wounded in this war before there is an increase in wages.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Then the gentleman wants to see more wounded men?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker. Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of this bill? Mr. Speaker, I desire the question put to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. PAYNE. I desire the Chair to lay before the House the bill—

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I have one more bill I desire the House to act on—a bill of great exigency.

Mr. PAYNE. But the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has demanded the regular order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. On that bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not care to insist on the regular order generally. I objected to that particular bill.

TEMPORARY APPOINTMENTS OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of joint resolution (S. R. 167) ratifying and confirming certain temporary appointments of officers of the Navy.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc. That the temporary appointments made by the President on and after April 21, 1893, and up to the date of the passage of this joint resolution, of officers of the line and staff of the Navy, are hereby ratified and confirmed, to continue in force during the exigency under which their services are required in the existing war; Provided, That the officers so appointed shall be assigned to duty with rank and pay of the grades established by existing law, and shall be paid from the appropriation "Pay of the Navy."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, in preparing for events which so rapidly succeeded each other in the exigency which forced itself upon us, it was necessary for the President to make these appointments, as was done in 1861, in advance of the final passage of the legislation authorizing such appointments. The necessary legislation was in process of preparation in the naval appropriation bill; but the delay which occurred in the final passage of that bill rendered it necessary that the Executive should make these appointments anticipatorily. The joint resolution which the Senate has passed and on which I now ask the action of the House is similar to one passed in 1861, when the President of the United States was obliged to act promptly and make some appointments prior to the enactment of the legislation conferring upon him regular authority in the matter.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the character of appointments made?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. They are appointments of officers in the Volunteer Navy—temporary officers provided for in the naval appropriation bill. This bill is designed to validate such appointments as were made prior to the signing of that bill by the President.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is this bill recommended by the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Oh, yes; this resolution was drawn at the Navy Department. A letter of the Secretary of the Navy, embraced in the Senate report, will give all the information necessary on this subject. I ask that the Clerk read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 14, 1898.

Sir: Referring to this Department's letter of the 5th instant, inclosing the draft of a joint resolution for the purpose of ratifying and confirming certain temporary appointments of acting officers of the Navy, made on and since the 21st ultimo, I have to state that after conference with Hon. CHARLES A. BOUTELLE, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, and at his instance, certain modifications of the draft referred to are suggested. The modifications embrace the omission of the words "acting" and "temporary acting appointments," and the reference to such appointments as made by the President, instead of by the Secretary of the Navy, and are intended to conform to the provisions for these appointments as enacted in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the forthcoming fiscal year.

In making appointments prior to the passage of this act, and in anticipation thereof, as orally suggested by the committee, the Department conformed to the provision contained in the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 9878) when reported to the Senate, which, as you are aware, was afterwards changed by substituting "the President" for "the Secretary of the Navy," as the appointing power, and by striking out the word "acting" before the word "officers."

A draft of the proposed resolution, in the form suggested, is herewith transmitted, with the recommendation that it be substituted for that inclosed in this Department's letter of the 5th instant, above mentioned.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,

Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

Mr. DOCKERY. As I understand it, this joint resolution validates certain action taken by the President in making appointments prior to the approval of the naval appropriation bill, which is now the law.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. And the Senate inserted in the resolution drawn at the Department an amendment bringing it up to the present date. Authority on this subject was given in the regular naval appropriation bill and is now the law.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman please state what was the action taken by the President? He states that this bill validates certain acts of the President; we would like to know what he did.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The joint resolution validates the action of the President in appointing certain officers in the Navy on temporary duty to go upon our cruisers and other vessels suddenly called into service. These appointments were made before the final passage and approval of the naval appropriation bill, in which the authority to make these appointments was given.

Mr. GAINES. Then they were practically emergency appointments?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. They were all emergency appointments. This joint resolution simply validates the action of the President up to the stage when the Navy bill took effect.

Mr. HANDY. About how many of such appointments were there?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am unable to state how many, but the number was small compared with the number that have been appointed since. These were the early appointments, made when they were fitting out some of these vessels for temporary service. It was known, of course, that the naval appropriation bill contained the provision giving this authority, and it was not deemed proper or wise for the Executive to await the final passage of the bill. He was obliged to go somewhat on faith.

Mr. HANDY. In asking the passage of the resolution validating what was done the Navy Department sent in no list of the appointments to be validated?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No, it did not; and I did not ask for any such list because it did not seem to be important that it should be given. The letter of the Department called attention to the fact that a similar act was passed by Congress in 1861, validating similar action of the President at that time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If I may be allowed, I can answer the question of the gentleman from Delaware. I understand that there were thirteen of these appointments.

Mr. HANDY. I have no doubt that the measure is all right.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is entirely proper legislation; there is no doubt.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOSPITAL CORPS OF UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is now willing to accede to the consideration of the hospital bill, which I desired to bring up a few moments ago, if he be allowed the privilege of offering such amendments as he desires, to which I heartily agree.

Mr. GAINES. I believe the Chair ruled the other day that when an objection had been made to the consideration of a bill the objection could not subsequently be withdrawn. That ruling was made in connection with the consideration of the labor-arbitration bill. I am perfectly willing that this bill shall be taken up if fully explained. I only desire to call attention to the ruling heretofore made.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair recollects the circumstances to which the gentleman refers, the House was engaged upon another matter of business when the gentleman who had objected undertook to withdraw his objection. But if the gentleman objects—

Mr. GAINES. I have not objected. The gentleman from Alabama who objected wants now to withdraw his objection. My statement is that in a similar case the other day the Chair objected to the withdrawal of the objection, and said it could not be done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that on the occasion referred to, when the effort was made to withdraw the objection the House was engaged in some other business.

Mr. GAINES. I do not remember the matter that way; but I may be mistaken.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I consented to the request of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] that I withdraw the objection I made, provided the opportunity is given to amend this bill on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] is right in making the point that the objection can not be withdrawn, because it is effectual when it happens; therefore that matter will have to come up at some other time.

Mr. GAINES. I make no objection to considering it. I am only reciting a bit of history.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is right in demanding uniformity of action.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I understood the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection can not be withdrawn after we have passed to another thing. The matter may again be presented to the House, but the objection can not be withdrawn.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer this bill again. It is of great importance that our surgeons be given this authority.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Maine that I am willing to vote for this or any other bill that looks to carrying out the reasonable requests of the War and Navy Departments with respect to this war, but this bill reorganizes the Hospital Corps for all time, as was stated in the discussion a few days since. It may be a very proper reorganization. I have no special information on the matter. I am quite willing to defer to the judgment of the gentleman from Maine with respect to the bill if it is limited to the present war. During this war we may be able to get some experience which will enable us to improve upon the pending bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will say to the gentleman that it is perfectly automatic, and, so far as this bill may operate, the force will shrink when the war is over.

Mr. GAINES. Can we not say that in so many words?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Yes; but it is not necessary. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that it is no more necessary to say so than in the law in regard to surgeons, because as soon as we decrease the number of our vessels, why we automatically decrease the assignment of these men.

Mr. GAINES. Can you not say it shall be so in so many words at the end of this war?

Mr. HENDERSON. Let us pass the objection point, and then we can take up this question.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Certainly. I am willing to have you offer any amendment you wish. We are very anxious to get some kind of a hospital corps.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman consent in advance to put in a provision that the operations of this bill shall be limited to the existing war?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Let the House vote on it. If the House insists on it, I am willing; but I should prefer not to do it on my own responsibility, because I think the operation of the law will regulate itself.

Mr. HANDY. Would the gentleman be willing to accept such an amendment?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am perfectly willing that the House shall vote on it and vote it in or out. In other words, so far as I have anything to do with it, I am perfectly willing to conform to the wishes of the House.

Mr. HANDY. It may be voted upon, with your opposition to its adoption?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Why certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am afraid there will be no chance for this side of the House to secure the adoption of the amendment under those circumstances.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do not think the gentleman would want to incorporate an amendment that the House will not approve of.

Mr. HANDY. The conscience and judgment of the House are so largely in the gentleman's keeping in reference to these matters—

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Oh, no; I do not think that. I think we all ought to agree to let the House decide these questions.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OTEY. If another bill is brought up and passed, then I understand this can come up; but I understand the ruling to be that it can not come up until there is some other business. I understood the Speaker to say that.

The SPEAKER. Until there is an interval, when there is no business existing.

Mr. OTEY. I was going to suggest that if the Chair would recognize me on my bill, then that would make some intervening business. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I ask unanimous consent that we may consider the bill, with the privilege of offering such amendments as gentlemen may desire.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to recognize the bill of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. OTEY], because it is a reasonable one.

Mr. SHERMAN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. As against this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I do not demand it as against anything.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill presented by the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman will consent to that amendment going in, I shall object.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What amendment is it you want?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Limiting the operation of the bill to the existing war.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will accept that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10220) to organize a hospital corps of the Navy of the United States, to define its duties and regulate its pay.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. "Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be limited to the existing war with Spain."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of section 4 the following:

"Provided, That the operations of this act shall be confined to the—

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. "Shall be limited."

The CLERK (reading)—

Limited to the present war.

Mr. GAINES. "To the existing war with Spain."

Mr. BARTLETT. "The pendency of the existing war."

Mr. PAYNE. "Duration."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Let the amendment be read again.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of section 4 the following:

"Provided, That the operation of the provisions of this act shall be limited to the duration of the present war with Spain."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I accept the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken on the amendment; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PEARCE of Missouri) there were—ayes 102, noes 2.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAINES. That is one vote in favor of the people, anyway. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now demand the regular order.

Mr. PAYNE. The regular order would be the business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to have the bill (S. 4645) to provide an American register for the steamship Zealandia considered.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. PAYNE. I think not. The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries have reported substantially the same bill.

The SPEAKER. Substantially the same bill, and asked for its consideration?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

The SPEAKER. That is right. The Clerk will report the bill.

AMERICAN REGISTER FOR STEAMSHIP ZEALANDIA.

The bill (S. 4645) to provide an American register for the steamship Zealandia was taken from the Speaker's table and read by the Clerk, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamship Zealandia, owned by the Oceanic Steamship Company of San Francisco, Cal., to be registered as a vessel of the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this vessel is owned by a corporation incorporated under the laws of California, of which all the stockholders are American citizens. It is now sailing under the Hawaiian flag. It was built in Great Britain. It is now on the way from Honolulu to San Francisco. It is expected to arrive in port within the next twenty-four hours, and has been chartered by the Assistant Secretary of War for the purpose of transporting troops from the Pacific coast to Manila. The bill has passed the Senate, and has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. GAINES. What does the bill provide?

Mr. PAYNE. An American register for this vessel.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Would it not be just as easy to pass the joint resolution to annex the Hawaiian Islands as to pass this bill? I favor now, as I always have, the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands, and hope they soon will be under the Stars and Stripes. If they were, this bill would not be necessary.

Mr. PAYNE. The passage of this bill is necessary, for the reason that the owners refuse to charter it for this purpose unless they are granted the privilege of American registry.

Mr. SULZER. My question is, Would it not be just as easy to pass the resolution annexing the Hawaiian Islands as to pass this bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Perhaps the gentleman will put that bill through and get rid of the necessity for this.

Mr. SULZER. I should like to, and I wish I could.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the discussion should be confined to the topic before the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. HANDY. I would like to hear read the report on the House bill substantially similar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. I have the report of the House committee.

Mr. HANDY. I would like to hear read the report of the House committee reporting a bill substantially similar to this one.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman raise the point of order that this bill is not properly before the House?

Mr. HANDY. I just want the report read for information, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PAYNE. It may be read in my time, Mr. Speaker.

The report (by Mr. PAYNE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries report back H. R. 10427, to provide an American register for the steamship Zealandia, and recommend that the bill do pass.

This steamship is of 2,750 tons register; is owned by the Oceanic Steamship Company, of San Francisco, a corporation organized and incorporated under the laws of the State of California, and the capital stock of which is owned exclusively by people of the United States. She is now registered under the Hawaiian flag.

The sole reason for a favorable recommendation in this case, beyond the fact that she is owned by citizens of the United States, is that the Zealandia has been chartered for use for military service by the War Department, as will be seen by the annexed letter of the Assistant Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., May 20, 1898.

SIR: The Department having chartered the steamship Zealandia, of the Oceanic Steamship Company, for military use during the war with Spain, I have the honor to request that she may be put in commission at the earliest practicable date.

Very respectfully,

G. D. MEIKLEJOHN,
Assistant Secretary of War.

HON. S. E. PAYNE,
Chairman Merchant Marine and Fisheries,
House of Representatives.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GAINES. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HANDY. I withdraw that motion for a moment, as I understand the gentleman from Tennessee has something he desires to say.

Mr. GAINES. On page 5032 of the RECORD I am reported as saying:

Well, give it a slap, anyhow.

That is an incorrect report. What I did say was:

Well, try your hand on it, anyway.

Quite different. We were then discussing the labor-arbitration bill, for which I voted, and I have always voted for labor legislation. What I was trying to do was to get the bill discussed so we could see what it contained, and wanted the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. GREENE] in his time to do so.

Mr. HANDY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BENNETT. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 24.

Mr. HOOKER. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SIMPSON. Too late.

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman rose before the Chair announced the result.

The question was taken on ordering tellers.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-seven gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number.

Mr. HOOKER. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Too late. I make the point of order that it is too late to call for the yeas and nays after calling for tellers and failing to get them.

Mr. PAYNE. That would suspend the Constitution, would it? The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A point of order. A parliamentary inquiry. About two or three weeks ago I raised this very same point and the Chair ruled against me.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Twenty-one gentlemen have arisen; and on the last vote twenty is sufficient.

Mr. BLAND and Mr. RICHARDSON. The other side.

The SPEAKER (after counting). On this question the ayes are 21, the nays 103; the yeas and nays are refused; the ayes have it; and the House stands adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

And accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War recommending a credit in the accounts of Lieut. Col. Amos Stickney—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an urgent estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for subsistence of the Army for the current fiscal year—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy relating to the importance of keeping open and manned the life-saving stations upon the Atlantic and Gulf coasts during the war and transmitting the draft of a bill for that purpose—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. JENKINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 4578) to remove the disabilities imposed by section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1407); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. COOPER of Texas, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8008) to refund to the State of New York certain duties paid by said State in 1863 to arm State troops organized to aid in suppressing the then existing insurrection against the United States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1412); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MAHON, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10371) conferring on the Court of Claims jurisdiction with respect to certain claims, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report

Mr. WANGER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 636) for the establishment of a light-house and fog signal at a point north of the bell buoy near the broken part of the Pollock Rip Shoals, on the coast of Massachusetts, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1419); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8735) to establish a light and fog-signal station at or near terminus of what is known as the Straight Channel, in Maumee Bay, near Toledo, Ohio, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1420); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8882) for the reestablishment and reconstruction of a light-house at or near mouth of Salem Creek, New Jersey, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1421); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GRIFFIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10378) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the payment of pensions, and for other objects, for the fiscal year 1898, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments. I ask that the bill may be put upon its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the committee be acted upon as they are reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That course will be pursued, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BATE. I should like to ask if this is a bill appropriating money out of the Treasury?

Mr. HALE. I suppose it will take money out of the Treasury.

Mr. BATE. I suggest the want of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum is suggested by the Senator from Tennessee. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The reading of the bill was resumed. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, line 11, before the word "employment," to insert the word "temporary;" so as to read:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

For the temporary employment of such additional force of clerks, messengers, laborers, and other assistants as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be proper and necessary to the prompt, efficient, and accurate dispatch of official business in the War Department and its bureaus, to be allotted by the Secretary of War to such bureaus and offices as the exigencies of the existing situation may demand, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to page 3, line 19.

Mr. ALLEN. I was not in the Chamber when the bill was laid before the Senate. I desire to inquire if this is a general deficiency bill?

Mr. HALE. No; it is mainly pension deficiencies, with a few items for the two Houses that are necessary at the present time.

Mr. ALLEN. Is there any intention to lay a general deficiency bill before Congress prior to final adjournment?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. I will promise the Senator that it will be large enough to please anyone.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, line 19, to strike out "December 31, 1898," and insert "March 31, 1899;" so as to read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 24, before "hundred," to strike out "fifty-five thousand eight" and insert "seventy-eight thousand seven;" so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 5, before "dollars," to strike out "thirteen thousand two hundred and ninety-five" and insert "eighteen thousand seven hundred and forty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill the following:

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Are we agreeing to these amendments as we go along?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments are agreed to as they are read.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to give notice that to one or two little amendments I desire to call the attention of the Senate, and I will say now—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will do so after the bill has been read through.

Mr. WILSON. I want to understand why we exempt the clerks who are provided for the War Department from a civil-service examination and do not exempt those to be employed in the Treasury Department? That is what I want to get at when the proper time arrives.

Mr. HALE. When the reading of the bill is completed we will go back to those amendments.

Mr. WILSON. All right.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to add to the bill the following:

For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers to committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill the following:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For compensation and mileage of Members of House of Representatives and Delegates from the Territories for the fiscal year 1897, $4,633.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments of the committee are completed.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if the expenses of the investigation made by the Committee on Naval Affairs for the destruction of the Maine are included in this bill?

Mr. HALE. In the office of the Secretary, Mr. Nixon, who has charge of all those matters, has gathered up the deficiencies in reference to all the investigations up to the present time and what are likely to take place during the rest of the session. So the bill covers everything.

Mr. ALLEN. Some time ago, probably two months ago, I introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Naval Affairs to make an investigation into the circumstances of the destruction of the battle ship Maine. I assume that that committee, under the leadership of the Senator from Maine, has discharged its duty under the resolution, and, so assuming, I should like to ascertain if the expenses of that investigation are embraced in this bill.

Mr. HALE. Everything for expenses of inquiries and investigations is embraced in this bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Allow me to ask the Senator if that investigation has been made?

Mr. HALE. It has not.

Mr. ALLEN. Why not?

Mr. HALE. Because the Committee on Foreign Relations took the matter up and the Committee on Naval Affairs did not think it advisable to interfere with that investigation.

Mr. ALLEN. The resolution was imperative, and the committee saw fit to overrule the imperative requirement of the resolution.

Mr. HALE. The committee took that course, and is, of course, subject to any further instruction of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I suppose it is subject to further instruction, but the question is whether it will obey the instruction when given it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will remember that the word "immediate" was stricken out of the original resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. That was stricken out upon the assurance of the Senator from Maine that the investigation would be made.

Mr. HALE. But the Senator from Maine did not at that time know that another committee was to be intrusted with the work, as it was afterwards, and he felt that the spirit of his declaration was carried out from the fact that another committee did the work.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I submit in fairness to the Senate, if not to the author of the resolution, the Senator from Maine ought to have returned the resolution with some kind of a report, that it might be disposed of by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Naval Affairs can do that if the Senator desires it. The Senator will remember that subsequent to his resolution the Senate took the matter up and in form referred the same inquiry to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and the Committee on Naval Affairs considered that that was an instruction to them not to proceed, as the Senate had acted afterwards in giving it to the other committee.

Mr. ALLEN. The Committee on Foreign Relations simply acted on the report of the naval board of inquiry. Its report, if I may be permitted to use the expression, was a secondhand report. That did not relieve the Committee on Naval Affairs, which was charged in imperative and unequivocal language to make a report, from making that report.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Foreign Relations took other testimony. It summoned witnesses.

Mr. ALLEN. Assuming that the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharging its duty as directed and had incurred some expense, I made the inquiry of the Senator if those expenses were embraced in this bill.

Mr. HALE. Whatever expenses have been made by any investigation of any committee, as I have said, are covered by this appropriation.

Mr. ALLEN. But I understand the Senator to say that no investigation was made.

Mr. HALE. None by the Naval Committee.

Mr. ALLEN. And therefore no expense was incurred by that committee?

Mr. HALE. None whatever.

Mr. ALLEN. And therefore no expense from that committee is embraced in this bill?

Mr. HALE. None whatever.

Mr. ALLEN. None whatever. I am very thankful to the Senator for his frankness.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments to the bill as in Committee of the Whole, it will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President—

Mr. HALE. Let the bill be reported to the Senate first.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HALE. Now let the Secretary go back and read the provisions with reference to clerks, on pages 2 and 3.

Mr. WILSON. I do not care enough myself about the matter to return and have the paragraphs read or debated at length. I will just call attention to the fact, which only a moment or two ago came to my notice, that in one paragraph, empowering or authorizing the employment of additional clerks for a limited time, the Secretary of War is very properly, in my judgment, permitted to make the allotments.

It would seem that by the phraseology of the bill some places have been taken out of the classified or civil service. I very much regret that this should be done by some very distinguished civil-service reformers. I am told it was done in the other House. I did not suppose that there was a civil-service reformer in the Senate, and therefore it must have been done in the House.

But in the very next place almost in the bill, on the next page, there is also a similar paragraph for the employment of additional labor for a limited period of time in the Treasury Department, which has the requirement that the employees shall go to the classified service, I take it, because the paragraph is entirely silent on that subject. I suppose the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury has made this recommendation.

If it was proper to give the Secretary of War the right to designate certain employees of his Department, it might have been proper to have given the same power to the Secretary of the Treasury. I am myself opposed to the whole scheme, and I can not understand why so distinct and marked differences should have been made in the bill in like employment in two different Departments under the Government.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, if there is to be an abandonment of the principles of the civil service in the appointment of a lot of clerks in the War Department or in any other Department, I think the Senate is entitled to some explanation of the matter. There has been no statement made by the Senator having the bill in charge that any such change in the practice was to be made, and but for the remarks made by the Senator from Washington the Senate would be passing upon this matter utterly ignorant of the proposition to have a lot of clerks employed during the next few months without being subject to the civil-service rules.

I hope before this measure passes from the consideration of the Senate there will be an opportunity for an explanation and an opportunity for Senators to determine whether they will allow this infraction or modification of the civil-service rules. It seems to me if the system is to prevail generally, it should prevail in this particular case and that those who have passed the examinations and whose names are on the list of eligibles should have their rights respected when there is to be an additional force of clerks employed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will explain lines 11 and 12 and line 18, on page 2.

Mr. HALE. Let the Secretary read those paragraphs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hardly think the Senator from Washington has read the bill carefully or he would not have made anything like the statement he did.

Mr. HALE. The bill speaks for itself.

Mr. WILSON. I am subject to criticism by the distinguished Senator from Missouri. My attention was just called to it a moment before I rose. We do not have in the Senate every opportunity, as the Senator knows, to examine these things. Every Senator always knows about whatever is in an appropriation bill just brought in, and therefore a Senator is subject to criticism for not knowing something about a bill that has just come in.

Mr. HALE. The bill speaks for itself. I will read the clause and the Senator can see that there is no trouble in it. To begin with, the Senate has put in the word "temporary," so that these appointments do not permit any increased regular force in any of the Departments. It is one of the things that is made necessary by the war. The work in these auditing departments has been immensely increased. The House sent the bill here with the following language:

For the employment of such additional force of clerks, messengers, laborers, and other assistants as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be proper and necessary to the prompt, efficient, and accurate dispatch of official business in the War Department and its bureaus.

That is a general provision. It does not in any way touch civil service. We have made it temporary. But if the civil-service rules comprehend this kind of clerkship they will all have to be examined. The paragraph goes on and says further:

To be allotted by the Secretary of War to such bureau and offices as the exigencies of the existing situation may demand.

That is the only discretion that is left to the Secretary of War. He allots them. We do not in terms say that there shall be so many clerks in one bureau and so many in another, but the distribution is left to the Secretary of War. However, there is nothing in the provision that interferes with the civil service. I am bound to say that I should not be specially displeased if there was, but the Senate committee did not think it worth while, although these are temporary clerks, to put in any provision interfering with the civil-service rules which apply to this Department or to all the Departments.

Mr. WILSON. May I ask the Senator from Maine whether the employees in the Treasury Department are not also to be temporary? Is not that employment to be just as temporary as the employment in the War Department?

Mr. HALE. What clause does the Senator from Washington refer to?

Mr. WILSON. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall appoint "the following additional clerks in the office of the Auditor for the War Department and in the office of the Auditor for the Navy Department for a period not exceeding from the date of the approval of this act until and including December 31, 1898, namely"—all those to be temporary, the same as in the other paragraph, on page 2.

Mr. COCKRELL. Their length of service is designated.

Mr. WILSON. The employment is purely temporary in both cases.

Mr. COCKRELL. Over on the other page there is no specific length of service. Therefore the word "temporary" had to go in. But here in the Treasury Department they can only be employed to a fixed date.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will read to the close of the paragraph, he will find that there is no trouble.

Mr. WILSON. The employment is to a fixed date. It is temporary service, because it is to apply only until next December.

Mr. COCKRELL. But it is not necessary to use the word "temporary" there, while it was necessary to use it in the other cases.

I wish to say, in addition to what the Senator from Maine has said, that the paragraph in regard to the employment of additional clerks in the War Department or the Treasury Department does not directly or indirectly affect the civil service in any shape, manner, or form.

Mr. HALE. Not in the least.

Mr. COCKRELL. And it can not be so construed. The clerks, messengers, laborers, and other assistants who are now under the civil-service law must be selected under that law.

Mr. PASCO. The language would indicate that they must be selected in the same way.

Mr. COCKRELL. In the same way.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question about it.

Mr. PASCO. Then the views of the Senator from Washington are incorrect.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly, and it is not strange. His attention was called to the words at the close of the sentence with reference to the discretion of the Secretary of War in allotting, but not in appointing.

Mr. PASCO. I made the remark I did because I thought it would be very strange if there should be so great a change made without proper notice to the Senate, and that without an opportunity to discuss and consider the matter the civil-service rules were to be broken in upon by appointing clerks without being subject to examination.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, a single word. I of course regret to differ from the explanations that have been made. My judgment is that as we move along we will find that under that paragraph the Secretary of War is empowered to designate clerks, and Senators will find that to be true before we get through.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 881) for the relief of Salvador Costa, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 8795) for the relief of Hubert Nyssen, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8141) increasing the pension of Price W. Hawley, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 188) for the suspension of the collection of certain taxes in the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon; and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon; and they were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 3035) to amend an act of Congress approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 2473) to provide for the payment of final judgments of the supreme court of the District of Columbia under an act entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," approved March 2, 1893, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 2863) to repeal an act entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," approved March 2, 1893, as amended by an act of Congress approved January 31, 1896, and to provide for the extension of certain streets and avenues, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10209) to repeal an act of Congress approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," and for other purposes, to report it with an amendment and submit a report thereon.

I want to appeal to the Senator from Iowa. I ask him if he would have objection to the present consideration of the bill if it should not lead to debate? It proposes to repeal the highway act, which is doing great injustice and resulting in litigation in the courts in the District of Columbia. It concerns the people of the District and involves millions of dollars of property. If it leads to debate, of course I will immediately withdraw it. It has to go to a conference between the two Houses. It is a short bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course I would be glad if the Senator could delay a matter of this sort until a later hour in the day. The Senator knows perfectly well how the time was occupied yesterday.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will withdraw the report.

Mr. ALLISON. Until later in the day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps before the day closes I shall have an opportunity to secure the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report is withdrawn.

Mr. HANNA, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4233) granting a pension to Solomon Kline, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4584) granting a pension to Mrs. Adda F. Thompson, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1299) granting a pension to Eliza E. Reed, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GEAR, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1442) for the relief of Robert J. Spottswood and the heirs of William C. McClellan, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

TAMPA BAY IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. PASCO. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 150) directing the Secretary of War to submit plans and estimates for the improvement of Tampa Bay, Florida, from Fort Tampa to its mouth in the Gulf of Mexico, to report it without amendment. It is simply a joint resolution calling for information and requires no appropriation. I ask that it be now considered. It will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THEODORE S. CROSS.

Mr. TURPIE. I wish to take an order of the Senate with respect to a private pension bill. It is the bill (S. 2107) granting an increase of pension to Theodore S. Cross. In that case the Committee on Pensions made an adverse report. I am now informed by the committee that the adverse report was a mistake. I therefore ask unanimous consent to reconsider the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not recall the bill. There is no objection to the course being taken which the Senator from Indiana has suggested.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask unanimous consent that the motion indefinitely postponing the bill be reconsidered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to a reconsideration of the motion? The Chair hears none, and unanimous consent is given. Shall the bill be recommitted?

Mr. TURPIE. The bill being now on the Calendar, I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

QUARTERMASTER'S SUPPLIES, ETC.

Mr. HAWLEY. I rise to a matter of a conference report. A day or two ago the Senate requested the House to return the

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Navy to issue an honorable discharge to Charles F. Brown, who served on the U. S. S. Hartford under the name of C. F. Banks, to date December 10, 1863, the day he left the naval service and enlisted in the Army, and provides that no pay or allowances shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of the act.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over, retaining its place.

WAR REVENUE BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 10100.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I propose to discuss at the present time that portion of the report of the Committee on Finance which provides for the issuance of silver certificates upon the bullion in the Treasury and the issuance of one hundred and fifty millions of Treasury notes, commonly called greenbacks.

In my estimation the amount of revenue which will be produced by any system of taxation will depend largely upon the policy which is adopted with regard to issuing more money or issuing bonds. I believe that with the issuance of bonds, largely more taxation will be required to realize anything like the same amount of money. We have already had many lessons from experience in that respect. During the civil war the experiment was fully tried as to the effect of a liberal supply of money upon the capacity of the country to pay internal-revenue taxes.

At one time during the war—if I recollect, about the close of the war—as much as $800,000,000 was raised in one year from internal-revenue taxes. There were not more than twenty-five millions of people to pay that money. That would be equivalent, if you take it per capita, to the raising by internal-revenue taxation of $900,000,000 with the present population. Everybody will recognize that that would be impossible. Why could we do it? In the first act, which was passed in July, 1861, when Congress commenced to provide for war arrangements, we commenced to give the people something with which to pay taxes. We increased the taxes right along, but we always issued the means of paying taxes in advance of the requirement to pay; in other words, we did not during that period compel the people to make bricks without straw; we did not adopt Pharaoh's old policy, which has been reprobated ever since. In the first act for issuing bonds it was provided that $50,000,000 of Treasury notes, receivable for Government dues, should be sold before there should be any bonds sold.

We have a further illustration of the effect of the supply of money upon the revenues of the country. While we were putting out new money in the shape of silver during the period that we put out, in round numbers, $500,000,000 of new silver money or paper representing silver, we retired over twelve hundred millions of our bonded debt during that identical period and paid $80,000,000 premium for the privilege of retirement, making about thirteen hundred million dollars which was paid on the bonded debt while we were supplying the people with money. We paid out about $75,000,000 or $80,000,000 a year right along. During all that time the revenues exceeded the estimates of the Treasury Department and the Finance Committee from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year, and it became a common remark that the people in this country were so growing in strength and prosperity that they could pay off the national debt without the slightest depression, without the slightest inconvenience, and we should have had no national debt now if we had not changed our policy and deprived the people of the means of paying taxes.

Since the adoption of the Cleveland-Republican party policy in 1893 we have been going into debt about $80,000,000 a year, and the estimates of the Treasury Department and of the Finance Committee are far in advance of the actual receipts; in other words, the revenues do not come up to the estimates, and we keep on piling up taxation; but that does not increase your revenues.

If 25,000,000 people during the civil war could pay $300,000,000 in taxes, and if from the sum realized from the ordinary taxation of the country you could pay off the debt at the rate of from $75,000,000 to $80,000,000 a year while we had new money constantly put out, and if after the new Cleveland policy was adopted we have been falling short in our revenues, it seems to me we should take these bald facts into consideration.

The majority of the Committee on Finance have proposed no new or experimental legislation. A bill was passed in March, 1894, providing for the coinage of the silver seigniorage in the Treasury belonging to the Government. That bill was passed in both Houses by a large majority, but was vetoed by President Cleveland on the 29th of March, 1894. There was at that time a law on the statute book authorizing the coinage of the seigniorage, but the bill that was vetoed proposed to anticipate the coinage and issue silver certificates to be used at once.

From the beginning there has been coined of the silver seigniorage and silver certificates issued therefor, $19,645,376. There is remaining of it, which it is the duty of the Treasury Department to coin, and which they are coining slowly, $42,488,427. The report of the majority of the Committee on Finance proposes to anticipate the coinage of the seigniorage, issue certificates on it, and coin it afterwards. That is not a very radical departure. Remember that the Treasury Department is coining the seigniorage now every day slowly, and probably in ten or fifteen years it will be all coined. I do not know exactly how long it will take, for that depends upon the action of the Department. All that this bill proposes in that regard is to make the seigniorage immediately available, as it would be ultimately available under existing law. That does not involve much of a silver question or any question as it stands, but it does involve the furnishing of money in this emergency for war purposes.

The majority of the committee recommend the issuance of $150,000,000 of Treasury notes—greenbacks. There were originally issued under various statutes from time to time $450,000,000. The policy of the Treasury Department under Mr. McCulloch was to retire them, and they were retired very rapidly. Finally, in 1868, retirement was stopped, and they were required to be reissued. There was supposed to be outstanding at that time $346,000,000, I think was the amount. That was making a very liberal allowance. Nothing had been allowed for the retirement. I do not suppose that there are now outstanding $300,000,000 of the greenbacks.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course the Senator desires to be exact about that.

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. There were authorized to be issued $400,000,000 only, and $50,000,000 were for special purposes. Those $50,000,000 by the provisions of the original law were to be retired. Secretary McCulloch, under the act of 1868, was authorized to retire them at the rate of not exceeding $4,000,000 a month; and he began retiring the $400,000,000. When he had retired them down to $356,000,000, there was a resolution passed by Congress in 1868 which stopped the retirement at $356,000,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. Three hundred and forty-six million dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. No; $356,000,000. Then, after the resumption act, there were others issued, as the Senator will remember, in 1873, during the panic in New York. So that the number of greenbacks had reached $380,000,000. Then, under the resumption act of 1875, there was again authority given to retire them down to $350,000,000. The act of May, 1878, limited them to the number outstanding, which was $346,000,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right.

Mr. ALLISON. So there were two laws for the retirement of greenbacks, and the total issue was only $400,000,000, with $50,000,000 for special purposes.

Mr. STEWART. I thank the Senator. I wanted to be accurate; but that is not very material.

Mr. ALLISON. No; it is not material, except as a matter of accuracy.

Mr. STEWART. A large portion of the greenbacks have been destroyed. There is nothing like that amount now out. There are other losses in the currency. The statement, of course, overestimates the currency we have in the country by a very large amount, probably one hundred and fifty or two hundred million dollars. This, however, is only a guess, and I do not care about going into that matter now.

The issuance of $150,000,000 of greenbacks at this time would be a very small matter so far as the aggregate is concerned, but it would be a very great matter so far as the business of the country is concerned.

It is now proposed by the House bill to issue $500,000,000 of long-time bonds and $100,000,000 of short-time bonds—$600,000,000 of bonds. The minority of the committee have reduced the amount of the long-time bonds to $300,000,000.

What will be the effect of issuing bonds at all at this time? The manifest effect will be to invite the investment of the money of the country in these bonds at once, which will necessarily produce contraction. Your tax bill is on business; and by putting out bonds and inviting the people to invest in them you will draw the money from the business of the country, and your taxes will fall short. I believe the difference in the two plans will make in the current year from one hundred to one hundred and fifty million dollars in revenue by taxes, and perhaps more.

Three hundred millions of dollars were paid in internal-revenue taxes on the business of the country in one year during the civil war. This was at a time when there was plenty of money in circulation. If the United States could pay on the public debt seventy-five to one hundred millions a year from taxation during the fourteen years while five hundred millions of new silver money was being circulated, it can not be maintained that silver was destroying the credit of the Government. If sixty millions a year with increased taxation has been added to the public debt since no new silver money has been put out and the country has been approaching the gold standard, how can it be maintained that the gold standard benefits the credit of the country?

The new money, previous to the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, reduced the debt not less than seventy-five millions a year. The want of new money since the repeal of the Sherman Act has increased the public debt about sixty millions a year. The difference between new money and no new money in the revenues of the Government from taxation has not been less than one hundred and forty millions per annum. The difference in revenue from taxation which would be produced under the bonded system of the House bill and the new money system of the Senate bill would undoubtedly be from one hundred and fifty to two hundred millions in the existing condition of the country.

But the goldites tell us if we put out more money, if we do not continue on our downward road toward barbarism through contraction in maintaining the gold standard, we will pay the penalty. I deny that any country ever paid any penalty by the issuance of more money. More money has always brought prosperity. The penalty inflicted upon every country which has been compelled to issue money to maintain its existence has been inflicted by the holders of the obligations incurred during the exigencies which compelled their issuance.

The bondholders and money changers who speculate upon the necessity of the country always require enormous contraction to enhance the value of their holdings at the expense of the people. The twenty-two years' suspension of specie payment during which England furnished money to her allies, Russia and Prussia, and sent forth vast armies to overthrow Napoleon, were years of unexampled prosperity in the British Empire. Her wealth and commerce increased and expanded more in that time than in any preceding century. At the close of the war the paper issues of the Government and of the Bank of England were worth only about 40 cents on the dollar. Legislation made them worth par, more than doubled the wealth of the money changers and bondholders by transferring to them the property of the great mass of the English people who were engaged in business and enterprise and were necessarily in debt. The penalty which the British people paid for the money which saved the nation and gave England the first place among the nations of the earth was paid by the industrial class to the sharks and money grabbers who manipulated the currency.

Mr. GEAR. How does the Senator propose to redeem the paper money he wants to put out?

Mr. STEWART. I will come to the question as to how we shall redeem it.

I repeat that when Great Britain enlarged her circulating medium to meet war expenses and the contracts and business of the country were adjusted to the new condition, there was no justice in transferring by a so-called resumption act the property of the industrial classes to the speculators of Lombard street. The penalty which the people paid was for having in their midst a band of unscrupulous and dishonest money manipulators.

Before the United States put out bonds in the war of the rebellion they put out Treasury notes and greenbacks to enable the people to pay taxes. It is almost impossible to get at the exact amount of paper of one kind and another which was issued and receivable for Government dues, but it amounted to more than $1,500,000,000 for less than 25,000,000 people; and instead of letting justice be done we contracted the currency more than one-half, funding the debt, selling it to a syndicate, and taking it away from the people, retiring greenbacks and demonetizing silver. These things were done, and the penalty we pay is the penalty for contraction and not for expansion.

Every robbery of the people by the money grabbers after a great war has been committed under the plea of saving the credit of the nation. The cry "Save the credit of the nation!" always covers a scheme of gigantic robbery of the people. It was the power of Great Britain to issue money, and it was the fact that she did issue it and made the Bank of England notes legal tender in effect by repealing all laws for the collection of debts in anything else, and carried on that gigantic war with Napoleon, and loaned Bank of England notes to Prussia and Russia to help the allied powers, which placed England amongst the foremost nations of the earth. When the war was over, the first resumption act consolidated all the wealth of England in a few hands and made a monopoly, which still exists and to-day dominates the world. Sixty per cent of the real estate of Great Britain was conveyed to the bondholders and more than half the personal property went with the land. This was done to strengthen the credit of Great Britain when the war was over and she needed no further credit.

When I hear people talk about maintaining the credit of the United States, I ask, What was it which sustained the credit of the United States when credit was necessary? It was the exercise of the power to issue money that sustained it; it was that which sustained the Union; it was that which made the arms of the United States victorious, and nothing else. It gave us abundant credit. When the war closed, we owed nothing to foreign powers and there was very little private indebtedness. The credit of the United States was grand. We had no occasion to borrow more money, and we had the best credit in the world.

How has this credit been strengthened? It has been strengthened by adding year by year to the debt of the country and the people. We are getting in debt to-day. The national debt is larger than it was at any time during the war, if measured in property, and that is the only way money can be measured. Your debt has increased all the time, and although you have paid over seventeen hundred millions and over a hundred millions in premiums for the privilege of doing so, yet it will take more of the average products of labor to pay it now than when the war closed.

How did it strengthen the credit of the Government to retire greenbacks and produce violent contraction after the war and break every enterprising man in the country? How did it strengthen public credit to paralyze business between 1871 and 1879? Was the public credit strengthened by destroying the productive power of the country by enforced idleness? The wealth of the country consists in its capacity for production. Every three or four years the whole wealth is reproduced, and if you strike at the capacity for production you strike at the credit. Hundreds of thousands of enterprising men were stricken down by that contraction, and that was a loss to the Government of the United States of more than the whole debt by contraction during the war. The Bland-Allison Act gave the people more money. I do not discuss the silver question now. I am discussing the money question. More money came through silver, production started up, enterprise progressed, and the nation paid more than $1,700,000,000 of its public debt.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me, although it is not exactly germane to his discussion, to put into the RECORD, while I have it in my possession, an official statement bearing out the proposition I made yesterday during the discussion with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY]?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I read from the report of F. E. Spinner, Treasurer of the United States, for 1874:

United States paper currency issued, redeemed, and outstanding to June 30, 1874, inclusive:

Total amount redeemed to July 1, 1874, $3,500,658,217.81.

So when I made the statement that we had called in and destroyed over $6,000,000,000 I was correct.

Mr. STEWART. We added to the debt and doubled the obligations of contracts.

Then, again, we had an extra session in 1893 to strengthen the public credit, and although we did not owe one dollar in gold, all our obligations being payable either in gold or silver and nobody questioned that, this Cleveland-Republican policy made a raid on the Treasury to strengthen the public credit and furnished $100,000,000 of gold to a syndicate to speculate in Austrian securities and convert the $2,400,000,000 of silver bonds into $2,800,000,000 of gold bonds. It was said that it was silver that destroyed the country, the money that had helped us to pay off $1,700,000,000 of indebtedness, the money that had brought into use the productive forces of the country and made the nation rich and strong. It was said that that was the evil and not the speculative fever which permeated the executive department and Wall street together.

Congress was brought together in a panic to strengthen the public credit by the repeal of all laws recognizing silver metal as money; to cut off all new money. We passed it, and our revenues have fallen off ever since, showing the falling off in our industries, because the revenues derived from the business of the country are a sure criterion of the condition of our industries. We pile on more taxes without money to pay them, as if that would increase our revenues. The result of the experiment of more taxation and less money to pay taxes has been illustrated so often that wise men ought to take notice. Look at the object lesson which Italy affords. She contracted an enormous debt on paper and then resumed specie payments in gold. When the paper was out people were at work and they had bread. Now they have destroyed their productive enterprise, and the people of Italy are literally starving to death to-day.

You can not employ the people because the man who invests in business loses money with falling prices. He puts his money in a plant and by the time he has done it—it takes a year or two—20 per cent has been added to the purchasing power of money, and if he had kept his money in his pocket or in a safe he could have bought the plant and saved a very large amount of money. That discourages investments.

Go to any bank in the United States, and they will tell you to keep out of business, because business will not pay. The demand for money to-day is not half what it was six years ago. I mean by "demand" the power to give something in return in order to get it. There are not half so many men who can go to a bank to-day and get money by giving security for it as there were six years ago. Why is it? Are they any less industrious, or is it because business will not pay? Nothing pays but money—the increasing purchasing power of money. I take it for granted that the Republican party does not know anything about the money question, otherwise it would be radically dishonest. I can not excuse these proceedings on any other ground than that the people who legislate here are ignorant of the money question, and I am inclined to deliver them a lecture on that subject right now, and tell them what money is.

Money is the creation of law. The material on which the mandate of law is stamped or printed has no more to do with money than the paper upon which a statute is written has to do with a statute or the paper upon which a will is written has to do with the will. It is the intention of the lawgiver in each case. So it is in the case of money. I do not want that to go on my own assertion, but I call attention to the decision of the highest courts of all civilized countries. In the time of Elizabeth money was wanted to carry on war in Ireland, to pay the troops. A law was passed to coin mixed money, as it was called, out of bronze and some other material of no appreciable value. It was taken to Ireland to be used as money and to be the only money, pound for pound and shilling for shilling and pence for pence, and gold and silver should be only bullion.

Before the law was passed and before mixed money was introduced in Ireland, a merchant in Dublin made a contract with a merchant in London for the purchase of £200 worth of goods. A hundred pounds was paid down in cash. The other hundred pounds was to be paid at a future time and place in Dublin. When the time came, there was no money in Ireland but mixed money. The Irish merchant tendered a hundred pounds of mixed money to the English merchant, who refused it and brought suit. It became the most celebrated suit of Elizabeth's time. It was more elaborately argued and the authorities were more carefully collated than in any other case decided in that period. It is reported in Sir John Davis's Reports, commencing at page 48.

It was held in that case by all the judges, after mature consideration, that the tender of mixed money was a good tender. They raised all the points against it, that it changed the contract, etc. It was held further that the mixed money was the money of the contract, because every sovereign state must necessarily possess the power to create money; that money was the creation of law. They fully confirmed the doctrine which was well understood among the Greeks, and declared that, inasmuch as all contracts were made with a view of the power of the government to create money, the money current at the date of payment was the money of the contract. If anyone wants to read some very able reasoning on that subject, I commend him to get that case and read it, with its clear statement and strong reasoning.

During the war we issued paper money which was legal tender for some purposes. We exercised that sovereign right. Greenbacks were legal tender with the exception of paying customs dues and interest on the public debt. After the war it was contended that although the issuance of money was a sovereign attribute and might be exercised by other governments, might be done by sovereigns, the power was not conferred upon the United States by the Constitution, and that the Government had no right to issue legal-tender money in time of peace. It was most elaborately argued and reargued and decided and rededided. It was suggested that the court was packed. The question was brought up again in 1883, and the great and final decision was rendered by Mr. Justice Gray, of Massachusetts, in which he reviewed the whole subject, and held that the United States had the power to issue money without regard to the material upon which it was stamped; that whatever Congress in its discretion might do was final, and that the courts had no power to review or question it.

This great power must be exercised with prudence and caution. I am aware that it is liable to abuse. If that power were not liable to abuse, if there were some other rule than the use of the precious metals whereby to regulate the quantity, I would be for discarding everything but paper. But we meet with difficulties when we undertake to do that, because although money is the creation of law, its quality depends upon its quantity. If you have too much money it is not fair, because it will inflate prices and rob the creditor. If you contract the volume of money you not only rob the debtor but you embarrass production and start down on the old road to decay and barbarism. Contraction of the money volume is the road which has been trod by every country when losing its civilization. No country has ever been able to stand a long period of constant contraction.

Bimetallism is simply the right to use both metals without limit for the purpose of coining them into money. We hear men talking here constantly about the parity of different coins. It would be just as proper to talk about the parity of different beans. That is not the question. The question is parity between property and money. Money performs many functions. All definitions that attempt to describe money by all of its functions fail. It is the fundamental instrument of association. Without it society could not exist, as shown by the use of some medium of exchange by every tribe of Indians. They avoid the isolation and destruction which follow mere barter by inventing some kind of money. It is the instrument of production, because without money no enterprise can be undertaken. Everybody concedes that.

There is hardly any undertaking you can conceive of that does not require money. It is the instrument of distribution. And here comes in one of its most important functions, because men must have money to buy, or property and the results of labor can not be distributed and enjoyed by the masses. When there is a deficiency of money there is a deficiency of distribution. Millions may starve where there are plenty of provisions on hand if the instrument of distribution is wanting. It is estimated that 10,000,000 people starved to death in India last year and the year before, and the reports from that country show that rice was cheaper than it had ever been before, that wheat was cheaper than it ever had been all over the world, and that there was abundance of food to be bought if the people had had money to buy, but it could not be distributed without the use of money. You must have a sufficient circulating medium in order to have distribution. It is the instrument of production, the instrument of business. That is why you can not add to the tax on business, reduce the volume of money, and increase your revenue.

It is, furthermore, the measure of time contracts. The whole system of human society depends upon time contracts. Even if a man has his own money, it involves time to use it in any enterprise. A man who bought a farm twenty years ago and has worked and improved it ever since, if he has raised any of the great staple crops, he finds that the appreciation of money more than balances his exertions. That is the effect of the gold standard. To-day there is not one-half of the productive force of the United States employed. The imagination can hardly conceive of the waste resulting from enforced idleness in this country. Many are starving, all are waiting for something to turn up, and it only turns up that those who invest in money and bonds get rich.

Everybody, therefore, seeks to invest in those things which go up, and the experience of the last twenty years has been that money alone has increased in purchasing power. A man who goes into productive business, upon which alone the wealth of any country depends, is regarded by the wiseacres as a fool. The idea that it is foolish to engage in productive pursuits to make a country great! The idea that every business house must leave productive pursuits alone and buy bonds, which are nonproductive! Every person who goes to a bank is advised to keep out of business, because it is hazardous. The result is that our productive capacity, our wealth, is dissipated by the thousands of millions every year for the want of money.

But the goldites tell us that what we want is good money. Certainly we do; but no money is good that is not honest. No money is honest which fluctuates in volume. The man who will expand and contract the volume of money with a view of enriching himself would use an india-rubber yardstick to cheat his customers. The only excuse that the gold party have is ignorance. They tell us that we must have good money and that every dollar must be as good as every other dollar. We have to confess right here in the Senate that there are two ex-Presidents still living who believe, or say they believe, that value is intrinsic. They have been preaching that doctrine to a great many people. If value were intrinsic in gold, it would stay there. If it were intrinsic in wheat, it would stay there. How would you get it out if it were intrinsic? They say it is intrinsic in everything. I say that value is the picture on the mind. It is estimation. It is fixed every time two men make a contract.

Examine this idea of intrinsic value. Suppose you were at a mountain spring with a dipper in your hand. You could quench your thirst without cost or sacrifice. Suppose you were on the Mohave Desert, 20 miles from a station, and a man were there with water and you had plenty of money. I think he could fix the price, because no man can travel on the desert 20 miles and live without water. The price of water at the spring and on the desert would be quite different, although their intrinsic qualities were the same. So when the quantity is limited it depends upon the estimation of man, what he will give for it, to determine what it is worth. If the value of wheat were intrinsic, how could it jump about the way it does? Price is value expressed in terms of money. On the boards of trade they fix the price, which is the value expressed in money, of wheat and every other commodity in which they deal. Why look at the stock reports to see what your wheat is worth if its value is intrinsic? Why not have it analyzed by a chemist?

What is true of everything else must be true of money. The value of money depends upon the quantity. The authors say that if other things were equal and you cut the money in half, prices would fall one-half. That can not be tested experimentally, because other things would not remain equal. If you destroy one-half of the money, you destroy more than one-half of the property. If you increase it and start other forces at work and make more people able to work, you create a market for it. So it does not work exactly that way. But the value of money as a whole depends upon the volume. Every man in business has two matters to look out for. First he must look to the supply and demand of the commodity in which he is dealing, because the commodity will rise and fall according to supply and demand, and the relative value of commodities is constantly changing.

Every man must look to that; and it has been shown that the skill of man can overcome all difficulties connected with the changes in the relative value of commodities, because if one kind of business does not pay, he can go into another. The capacity of the people to overcome all difficulties in the relative value of commodities other than money is shown by the fact that when there has been a sufficient supply of money the people have always had prosperity. Men have always overcome the conflicting relative values of commodities. But no people have ever been able to contend against a shrinking volume of money, which lowers the prices of all things. A general fall of prices means disaster, which no enterprise can avert. It has crippled our revenues, and it will cripple them more if we continue in this line.

But the advocates of gold say, "Are we not on the gold standard now?" No; you are not on the gold standard now and you will not be for a hundred years to come. There are thirty-six hundred million of full legal-tender silver doing duty in the world as money. There are $2,500,000,000 of uncovered paper. It would take to reach the gold basis throughout the world more than $6,000,000,000 of new gold. But the process of reaching the gold standard, the grinding process of falling prices and the misery that must follow, are too fearful to contemplate. One country after another has discarded silver and bought gold. The money powers are forcing them to do so. Poor, miserable Austria converted her $2,400,000,000 of silver bonds into $2,800,000,000 of gold bonds. Italy has discarded her paper to get gold and is starving her people to death.

Turkey is on a gold basis, you say. But she has inflated paper. Russia is moving to reach a gold basis. She has been on a paper basis and prospered. She is now moving in the other direction. Last year Japan tried this terrible experiment; Japan, which had been sleeping through ages in seclusion, came forth when there was this difference in exchange which gave her an advantage in the business of the world by the use of cheap silver, and assumed a place among the foremost nations of the world. She vindicated her power and honor in the war with China and astonished the world as a great naval power. She moved forward with leaps and bounds to a first position among the nations of the earth, and she attributed her success to the difference in exchange. Without assigning a reason, a year ago last December she financially committed harikari, and she will be relegated to the place from which she rose if she continues to struggle for the gold standard.

Two years ago this spring she pointed out in her Government report the reason why she had succeeded, and said she had been a child in competing with the giant manufactures of the Western World. She pointed out the fact that her wares were then being sold in all the commercial marts of Europe and America. She said then that China was the only country that could compete with her. She had opened four ports in China to all the world, and foreigners might go there and manufacture and by the use of Chinese labor become dangerous competitors. She called upon the Japanese to seize upon the opportunity and establish factories in the ports of China which she had opened. With all her indemnity from China she has now become bankrupt through her efforts to adopt the gold standard.

Chile was the foremost among all the Latin nations of South America. She was a proud, industrious, happy people, and a warlike people. In a fatal hour she adopted the gold standard, and she is now in the depths of despair. It is heartrending to read the papers of Chile and see the bankruptcy and ruin which the gold standard has produced.

Take Mexico. She never enjoyed industrial success until now.

Twenty-five years ago she was more lacking in industry than any other country in the world, certainly any other country on this hemisphere. She has advanced more in the last two decades, comparing her present condition with her condition twenty-five years ago, than any other country in the world ever did in the same length of time. Her coffee fields, her tobacco, sugar, and cotton plantations, her mining and other industrial pursuits furnish abundant evidence of the benign influence of an adequate supply of money. Although many of the people were peons under the old Spanish system, and nine-tenths of them are Indians, she has been able to pay current expenses. Twenty-five years ago she commenced the building of railroads and incurred enormous debts, public and private, but by means of her stimulated production she has been able to pay interest on her obligations. None of her railroads have gone into the hands of receivers.

If my Massachusetts friends will read the report of the Mexican Central Railroad and other railroads in Mexico controlled in Boston, they will read a eulogy on the Mexican system more eloquent than I can deliver. Our Boston friends say that the system of money in Mexico brings them wealth and keeps their roads out of bankruptcy. All those reports show the progress there. This is an object lesson furnished by a country which twenty years ago had no industrial progress. It shows the advantage of plenty of money, which has made Mexico a desirable place for enterprise and for emigrants from our gold-standard country.

Mr. GEAR. I ask the Senator from Nevada if the rates of transportation are not four times greater on this side of the line?

Mr. STEWART. I do not know about that, but I do know that the people have plenty of money with which to pay it, and they do pay it, and both the railroads and the people prosper. Here the people suffer for want of money and the railroads go into bankruptcy. More than half of them have gone through the process of reorganization in the last few years. If you have dear money, you must have cheap property, cheap railroads, and cheap labor.

Mr. GEAR. The employees on this side of the line make over 100 per cent more than they make in Mexico.

Mr. STEWART. The employees on the other side of the line get more than they ever did before, while on this side of the line they are being crowded out of employment.

Mr. GEAR. Of course it is true as a matter of fact that the employees on this side of the line get just 100 per cent more than they get in Mexico. There is no money in Mexico except silver, and they have to pay high prices for everything, while on this side they have low prices.

Mr. STEWART. Prices in Mexico of everything produced in that country are as cheap now as ever before, while wages have advanced.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me a moment?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Statistics show that since 1890, and that year the status of silver was tampered with in the interest of the gold syndicate and was completely demoralized in 1893, that labor has each year suffered. In the last campaign the railroads threatened that some of their employees would be discharged and that their hours would be reduced and their wages reduced if we had free silver. Yet during this time from 1891 the railroads have been constantly lowering the salaries of their employees, have been constantly decreasing the number per mile employed under the gold standard, while at the same time they have been increasing the salaries of their big officers.

Mr. GEAR. Mr. President—

Mr. STEWART. If there is going to be a discussion, I will go on.

Mr. GEAR. I will say that—

Mr. STEWART. I do not want to have anybody else's speech injected into mine, because I can make a good one myself.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Iowa wants to contradict my statement—

Mr. GEAR. I will say to the Senator that I will contradict it. I say that better wages have been received; that where wages have been reduced 10 or 20 per cent the number of hours has been reduced.

Mr. STEWART. I decline to yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senators will address their remarks to the Chair.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Nevada will pardon me, I wish to make—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will pardon me a moment.

Mr. STEWART. I will yield only to a very short interruption.

Mr. BUTLER. I want that statement in the RECORD. I want to give notice that I will put statistics in the RECORD which will refute what the Senator from Iowa says. What he says may be true in some special cases, but I will give the statistics for the whole country.

Mr. STEWART. I care nothing for special cases. I state without fear of contradiction what is a fact, that you are not paying laborers in this country one-half what they would have under a proper money system. Millions are out of employment, and hundreds of thousands, if not millions, are on short time. Production is discouraged. That is the condition of the country. Your wealth is being dissipated. It is said the laborers are paid as much as they ever were. I do not believe in any branch of business they receive as much as they formerly did, but I do not care about that. That is sticking in the bark. Trades unions may for the time being prevent reduction of their wages, but the grinding process will go on until wages will find a common level with property. You can not have cheap property and falling prices without having wages fall, too.

Employers put laborers on short time or discharge them when business will not pay. Senators discuss the supposed conflict between capital and labor. The conflict is between money and labor, and not between laborers and their employers. They call the employers of labor capitalists, but such capitalists are struggling between the upper and nether millstones. They have their enterprises on hand, but they can make no profit while general prices fall. Bankruptcy is before them. When the laborer is kept down, all the rest are kept down. The pursuits of all—the merchant, the builder, the manufacturer, and the laborer—who contribute to the wealth of the country are embarrassed. They are the wealth producers. The usurers and the contractionists are the wealth absorbers. A merchant who buys a bill of goods is a constant loser, because he is not only losing interest on his money, but the value of the money with which he bought the goods is going up while the price of the goods is constantly going down. The whole productive world, including all business, loses by contracting the volume of the circulating medium.

I repeat, we have only commenced to demonetize silver. Let Austria resume specie payments if she can buy enough gold. Let Spain, Portugal, and Russia do the same. Let them buy enough gold to get on a gold basis. Let the untold millions of the entire world struggle for gold, and their struggle will continue to bring down wages everywhere, because gold will go where it will buy most of the fruits of labor. There is a certain relation between labor everywhere, and if you bear down on the citizens of any country you bear down upon all.

Contracts are sacred, and ought to be maintained; but when changed without the consent of the debtor, their moral obligation is destroyed. If the hundred thousand million dollars the world owes is changed by reducing the volume of money, so that twice as much property is required to pay it as would have discharged it at the time the indebtedness was incurred, and if this change was made by the creditor class, why is there any more obligation on the part of the debtor class to pay it than there would be to pay a check the face value of which had been doubled by a fraudulent change of figures? A change in the measure of value is a change in the contract. No greater outrage can be committed than to change the volume of money or the pound weight. "Divers weights, and divers measures, both of them are alike abomination to the Lord" (Proverbs xx, 10). And the contractor of the currency is most abominable of all.

Some people are ignorant enough to suppose that gold always has the same value as compared with property.

As learned a man as Professor Sumner, of Yale, contends that gold is an exact measure of all other things, including time contracts. He will not admit that the supply of gold has anything to do with its exchangeable value.

Sound Money, the organ of the New York so-called Sound Money Association, while indorsing the doctrine of Professor Sumner, says that the value of money is established by the estimation of man, and that consequently 23.22 grains of gold, being always of the same weight, is always of the same value, just as a yardstick is always the same length. It is strange that such learned authorities can not distinguish estimation from distance. The yardstick is always 36 inches in length, but 23.22 grains of pure gold is sometimes worth just as much as a bushel of wheat, and sometimes more and sometimes less. There is a serious variation which can not be found in the gold or in the wheat. The amount of pure gold remains 23.22 grains and the amount of good wheat remains a bushel, but they will not exchange even. Why? Because one or the other has grown to be more desirable than it was when they were equal in value. And so it must ever be between gold and commodities. Their relative value must constantly change in obedience to the laws of supply and demand. A yardstick measures length, which is fixed by law.

But how can you fix estimation? It is impossible to fix value by law. You could not pass a law saying what shall be the worth of a certain amount of wheat or what shall be the worth of a certain amount of gold, because value is above law. It is estimation. You can not legislate how a man should think, but you can legislate so as to give him subjects for new thoughts. If you make money scarce by law, you will make every man who wants money estimate the value of money more highly than he would if the law made money plenty. In other words, although the law can not create value, because value is estimation, the law can create conditions which everyone must and will observe in estimating what money is worth.

This Congress can make a paper dollar worth five gold dollars to-day. If Congress should say that nothing but paper money shall pay debts and taxes, that gold shall not be money current, the same as they did in Elizabeth's time in regard to Ireland, the people would be compelled to have paper money, and they would estimate its value according to the supply. If the supply were only one-fifth of the present supply of money in the country, a paper dollar would be worth about five times as much as a gold dollar now is.

We are told that there is plenty of money in the banks; that they are full. They seem to suppose that the banks are full because there is plenty of money in the country. This is a great mistake. Money congests in the banks when falling prices, by reason of contraction, have made its use unprofitable in business. The purchasing power of money increases as the rate of interest decreases. As I said a little while ago, there are not half the number of men in this country that there were six years ago who can go to a bank and furnish security and get money. The bank can not trust them. Security is destroyed as the volume of money is contracted. It is suggested that the want of collaterals is the only trouble. Very true, because contraction destroys collaterals. Collaterals are worthless when property can not be sold for money. If nobody will buy property, collaterals are worthless, and the consequence is that money goes to the center to seek investment in bonds at a low rate of interest. The competition for bonds is so great that the Government can put them out for nominal interest. The bonds proposed in this bill will be absorbed at once by the people, if not by the syndicates.

I have had applications from Nevada making inquiry how these bonds could be obtained. They want more than $100,000 of them in my little State, and so all over the country there will be a scramble for these bonds. The money of the country will be absorbed in them. It makes no difference whether they are all put out at once or sold in small lots. As soon as the people know that six hundred millions of bonds are to be sold, they will hoard their money until they have an opportunity to buy them, and the contraction will begin at once.

Why do people think these bonds will be so valuable? Because they are money futures, and the experience of the last twenty-five years shows them that money is going up and property is going down. All who have money are seeking opportunities to invest it in bonds, to take advantage of the continuous rise in the purchasing power of money.

These bonds would start the whole country seeking investments in them and the business of the country would be neglected. If you pass your tax bill, no matter how, with the bond provision in it, I predict that it will not increase the revenue $50,000,000, perhaps not $25,000,000, because the money will not be used in business. You are taxing business and the money will be used in the purchase of bonds. How long is this to go on? When are we to get to the bottom? Some people say there is abundance of gold produced in the Klondike or somewhere and we will have all the gold required. In the first place, we have no accurate statistics about the production of gold; and if we will take the annual new coinage of the world and compare it with the amount of gold which the Director of the Mint claims is annually produced, it will be seen that the increase of the volume of gold money in the world is very small.

There is very little increase in the gold coin of the world, no matter what the production may be. On the other hand, the demand for gold coin is increasing very much more rapidly than the supply. The increase of population is much greater than the increase of the supply of gold coin. Only comparatively few of the nations of the world use gold as money. On the contrary, more than two-thirds, if not three-fourths, of the inhabitants of the world have either suspended specie payment altogether or do their business on a silver basis. The increasing demand for gold while so many nations are struggling to reach a gold basis will continue to enhance the purchasing power of gold and enhance the price of property for a century to come, if the corner on gold can not be broken. It is seriously proposed by the financiers of London and the Indian Council to put India on a gold basis without delay. India has more than a thousand million dollars of silver money in circulation. The amount of gold necessary to make the exchange from silver to gold in India alone will exceed the possible output of gold for coinage purposes for the next ten years.

Mr. ALLISON. Will it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly not.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the probable production of gold in our own country, say for the last year?

Mr. STEWART. Something over $50,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. We have imported in excess of our exports about seventy-five million. So there must be $125,000,000 more gold in the United States now than there was a year ago. I do not know in what form it is, but it must be in some form equivalent to money.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know whether that is true or not, but there has been more imported than was exported during the year. I have been trying to get at the amount of gold, but I find that it is only a guess with the Treasury Department. They start in with an arbitrary amount and they assume so much outside. They know what is in the banks and what is in the Treasury, and that is about all they know about it. Certainly the money which has been imported in the last year has not gone into circulation, but is still in the banks, and is held there for speculative purposes and not for use in the business of the country. If it had been silver or silver certificates instead of gold, it would have circulated and revived business. We do not know how much gold is used in the arts, and the Treasury Department does not make any allowance for gold taken out of the country by private hands. They assume that as much comes back as goes out. I do not think that assumption is correct.

One hundred thousand people go abroad annually. They start from home flush and come back pretty empty-handed. Instead of bringing back as much coin as they take away, I think they bring back very little United States coin. They take a large amount of American coin with them and save the cost of exchange, because gold is worth as much in Europe as in the United States. It suffers no discount. Its value is fixed by the mint laws of foreign countries. It is estimated that from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 are annually spent by travelers abroad. How much of this is taken out by private parties and how much through letters of credit and bills of exchange of which a record can be obtained is not known either to the public or to the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department guesses there is more than $750,000,000 gold in the country. If Mr. Gage should guess there was $1,000,000,000 in the country, it might be difficult to disprove his guess, but it would be no more so than it would be for him to prove that there is more than $500,000,000 in the country all told. Mr. Gage is a great guesser. He guesses that there never has been a cent or a dollar of any kind of money issued by the Government in the last thirty-five years lost or destroyed. He makes his statements upon the assumption that all the money ever issued by the United States which has not been retired by the Government itself is still in existence, and uses that absurd statement to show how much money there is per capita, and that there is great redundancy of currency requiring radical contraction.

As to the inflow of gold at this time, it is exceptional. We had good crops last year and they had a famine everywhere else. Our breadstuffs and meats were sent abroad in consequence of the famine. That is an exception, and the thing may turn against us next year. It can not be relied upon as a permanence, at all events.

Besides, right in this connection I want to call the attention of my friend from Iowa to a principle which I see the gold men constantly overlook. They say they want money good all over the world. All our Presidents say that. It appears to be a favorite expression of our Presidents, and particularly of our ex-Presidents. They say laboring men want money good all over the world. They appear to assume that the workmen do all their marketing in Europe; that they never use money in this country. There is no money good all over the world. The gold that is brought here is not money. It can not go into circulation until it is naturalized under our mint laws.

Money is only money within the jurisdiction which creates it. It is not money beyond that jurisdiction. Whether it is printed on paper or stamped on gold or on silver, it loses its money function as soon as it goes beyond the jurisdiction of the country that created it. I know of no international money except in one case. I refer to the Latin Union, where France, Belgium, Greece, Italy, and Switzerland agreed to make their coins a legal tender throughout the five countries.

It is true that foreign coins are sometimes converted into money by the countries to which they are exported, under laws which make them a legal tender. In 1793 Congress passed an act making all foreign coins full legal tender in this country according to the weight and fineness. The coin came here from the Spanish-American countries. Silver came in the shape of coin. The Spanish-American countries charged an export duty on bullion and none on coins; consequently silver came in the shape of coins. Our silver circulation was very large. There was much more silver in circulation than gold, but it was foreign silver coin made legal tender by our laws. The silver coinage of the United States previous to 1873 was nearly all recoinage of worn-out or mutilated foreign coins.

There was coined previous to 1873 over $80,000,000 of full legal-tender silver coin, and about $40,000,000 of subsidiary coin after the act of 1853 was passed limiting its legal-tender quality and diminishing the quantity of silver in the minor coins. The amount of silver recoined shows that the amount in circulation must have been very large.

The foolish absurdity by which the goldite attempts to deceive the people is a statement that there were only 8,000,000 silver dollars coined previous to 1878. But during that time there was 80,000,000 full legal-tender silver coin struck at the mint. It made no difference whether it was in dollars or smaller coins.

The irreverent use of the name of Jefferson, and the attempt to make him as wicked as Harrison or Cleveland, by the assertion that he stopped the coinage of the silver dollar, is in keeping with goldbug distortion of history. Jefferson, on account of the suggestion that silver dollars were being shipped out of the country, confined the coinage of silver for a time to half and quarter dollars, but never for an instant closed the mint to the free and unlimited coinage of silver equally with gold at the ratio fixed by law.

Jefferson was a good man, and his name ought not to be tarnished by placing it among the modern type of goldite Executives.

I will now return to the question of having money good all over the world. The money of any country is as good all over the world as it is at home, less the difference in exchange. When it leaves the country creating it, it goes as a commodity and not as money. Gold is the worst money that has ever been invented, because it is a traitor. It is the money of the speculator. It never was the money of the people and never was in general circulation in any country. Gold is a coward. When a country gets in distress it leaves that country and joins the enemy, and becomes naturalized under the mint laws of the enemy's country.

When our gold coin goes to Germany it is melted up and becomes German money as readily as it becomes English money or French money. I assert the fact, and deny contradiction, that no country has ever gone through a great crisis with the use of gold as money. England owes her existence to her sovereign power to create money. If she had adhered to gold through the great struggles she had in former times she would have been a fifth-rate power.

Money is not created for export. It is exclusively for home use. The exportation of money paralyzes business at home. Gold money is unreliable, because it can be so readily naturalized under mint laws of other countries. What we want is a money which, if sent abroad, will come back. That is the kind of money every nation needs and must have in a time of necessity. The United States would have fallen to pieces if the Government had attempted to issue bonds and buy gold to fight the battles of the country in the late war, as is now proposed to carry on the war with Spain. Gold was our most vindictive enemy during the war. The gold gamblers of New York and London, who are now so powerful in our financial affairs, used the gold board, which they compelled Congress to enable them to create, to keep up a constant fire in the rear while our brave soldiers fought in the field. They induced the Committee on Finance of the Senate to put the exception clause in the greenback, so that it would not pay customs dues or interest on bonds, and thereby compelled the United States to buy gold of them at a fictitious price fixed by the gamblers in gold.

These same gold gamblers now want bonds which will absorb the money of the country, enhance the purchasing power of gold, depress the price of property, and increase the distress of the taxpayers.

France, on every great occasion when it became necessary for her to maintain her existence, has been forced to resort to her sovereign power to create money. There has not been an instance when a great war was waged with gold. The only great war of modern times which was ever fought on a metallic basis was the German war against France. They did not suspend. The war was very short. They were well prepared; but they were on a silver basis.

Mr. CAFFERY. May I ask the Senator from Nevada a question?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. CAFFERY. Was the issue of what the Senator calls paper money made by the Bank of France or by the Republic of France to meet the war expenses referred to in the Franco-Prussian war?

Mr. STEWART. I think by the Republic of France. It was certainly the new Government. The empire was overthrown and Napoleon fled the country early in the war.

Mr. CAFFERY. My honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] spoke of that, I remember, in the speech he recently made in the Senate, and I understood him to distinctly state that the paper money which was issued was issued by the Republic of France. So I asked the question of the Senator from Nevada, as he was discussing that point.

Mr. STEWART. France has usually been wiser than other governments in money matters, because she has kept a large per capita circulation among the people, and that enabled her to pay the war indemnity to Germany. She issued bonds of small denominations to raise that indemnity, which were taken up by her own people. She would not sell them to a syndicate. I was complimenting a member of the French legation about the success of France in placing her loans with her own people and not selling them to syndicates. I said I understood that practically it was so much money which could be exchanged from hand to hand, that the people took it in that way. "Well," he said, "the Government is not entitled to very much credit for that. If the Government of France would sell its bonds to a syndicate, as is done by your Government, the Government of France would not stand very long, for the French people would not tolerate what your financiers do."

A few words more about international money. International commerce is not carried on with money. It is purely the result of the exchange of commodities, and nothing else.

Mr. CAFFERY. Is there any difference in that respect between domestic and foreign commerce?

Mr. STEWART. It is the interchange of commodities by the use of money; but the people of foreign countries do not use our money in foreign commerce. It is different in that respect from our domestic commerce. In the interchange of commodities money is used in domestic trade. The first demand falls on money. You first get the money, and then you buy property; then you sell it for other property, and that constitutes exchange; but in foreign trade it is different. It has that same double process.

When, for instance, we send our commodities to France, we sell them for French money. We use French money to buy French goods. We import the goods and thus complete the interchange of the commodities of this country for the commodities of France. We do not use American money to buy French goods, nor do the French people use French money to buy American goods. When the French people want to deal with us, they sell their goods here and buy our money, and with it they buy our goods. They have no other interest in our money except to know that it is good money with which to buy our goods, and we have no interest in their money except to know that it is good money in their country with which we can buy their goods.

When the money of one country is exchanged for the money of another country, its value depends upon its purchasing power in the country where it was created, and the business of exchange is to sell or exchange the money of one country for the money of another country. You can go to any exchange bank in New York, and they will tell you how many dollars it will take to buy a thousand yens in Japan or a thousand rubles in Russia. If you go to a bank in Japan or in Russia, they will tell you how much it will take of their money to buy a given amount of our money. That is the business of exchange. You do not want to export your gold—your money—because that will leave you short. Honest measure depends upon the stability of the value of money. It must always bear the same relation to the property for sale to maintain stability of value in money and stability in the general range of prices. Stable prices and honest money mean the same thing. So long as a stable ratio between the volume of money in circulation and the property for sale can be maintained the money which circulates will be honest, justice will be secured, and prosperity will be the result.

Gold is a very good commodity to export, because its price is fixed abroad by mint laws, but its exportation means disaster to the country from which it is exported. On the other hand, the exportation of wheat or other commodities brings back gold or something else which the country needs, and is highly beneficial. Wheat is a legitimate export and more desirable for that purpose than gold, for it works no injury to the country exporting it. The price of gold being fixed, it is more convenient for export than any other kind of money. Every other kind of money when exported must stand the discount for being sent back to the country of its creation. It can not be naturalized at par in the mints of other countries.

Gold is the only money that has no country and no home. We want a money which will stay in the country where it is produced. Paper money and silver money stay at home, though silver has some of the tricks of gold, but it was not so treacherous as gold when the mints were open to both. It was the people's money on account of its weight, its general circulation, the denomination of its coins, etc., so that it could not be conveniently collected and shipped away. It never was shipped away to the extent that gold was. Gold is the most treacherous of all materials used as money. It is the speculator's money; it is the money which harasses and annoys mankind. Why should such a material have been selected as a universal money I have never been able to understand, except that it is like the marked card or loaded dice of the gambler. That may be why gold gamblers like it.

Gold as a measure of value means ruin.

It is a measure of dishonesty, a measure of speculation, a measure of treachery. If we had depended upon gold we would not now be a nation. If England had depended upon gold England would not now exist as a nation. So with France, and so with almost every other nation. Italy would have gained her liberty if she had not discarded gold.

It is proposed that we shall fight the world for gold and fight the war with Spain on a gold basis both at the same time. No country every undertook such a double war before. A war against all mankind for the acquisition of gold and at the same time a war against a foreign country was never before contemplated. We must destroy our industries to get gold, because we must compete with all the world for gold; and that competition is growing harder and harder every year as one nation after another enters into the contest.

The road is downward; it holds forth a delusive hope. Because accidentally we had good crops this year and we got a little gold back, it is a mistake to think we can win this industrial fight. If we win this fight, our people must work for less than the Europeans do; we shall have to come to a lower level if we draw their gold from them, and we see them starving in their efforts to get gold in Italy, Austria, and other countries.

When we see people starving under the hard conditions imposed upon them, shall we enter that contest? I admit we can stand more than can any other country; our natural resources surpass those of all Europe; our inventive genius has no parallel in any race on earth; our capacity for production on account of our great resources and the genius of our people seems unparalleled, but if we must enter into competition with all the world for the instrument with which to do business, we must go down, down, down—the road has no upward turn. I ask for justice; I ask for an honest measure of value.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me a question at this point?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. There is a great deal of talk being made through the press and in Congress about the price of wheat. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that December wheat is as low as it has ever been in the history of this country. I see from to-day's Chicago market that December wheat is quoted at 82½ cents. That makes it worth to the farmer about 60 cents a bushel.

Mr. STEWART. That is just what is going to happen; they are trying to fool the farmers because they had an accidental chance to sell some of their products.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a mere speculative price, of course.

Mr. STEWART. It is based upon the estimate that there will be good crops elsewhere. The price of wheat has not changed—the intrinsic quality of wheat has not changed, but the amount produced elsewhere has changed. Gold went from us for many years because other countries produced abundant crops to buy gold. When good crops came to us and famine visited them, gold came this way. Good crops abroad will again take our gold away, and on the gold standard constant fluctuations in the price of our products and in the value of our land are inevitable. Such an elusive material can not be an honest measure.

Mr. ALLEN. If I may have the attention of the Senator for just a moment, our Republican friends seem to want to take advantage of the corner that Leiter and Armour have on the wheat market at this time, and of the absolute starvation of Europe for a lack of that wheat, and they want the credit for the present increase in price.

Mr. STEWART. Of course. This whole system is a system of cornering, just as the gold board did in New York during the war. They cornered gold then just as they propose to do now. They want to corner agricultural products. It is the Cleveland-Republican system. They are cornering everything they can corner at every opportunity. That is what they want. They do not have any idea of anything but cornering, so that they can make money for themselves.

When we come to a discussion of the main question, when we come to consider money, the end and aim of monetary science is to maintain stability in values and in general prices.

All the authorities agree that the general prices are controlled by the volume of money. Then it is the duty of the Government, having a monopoly of making money and denying that right to the individual, to see that the volume is so arranged that the supply shall be equal to the demand; that the ratio between money and property shall remain the same. If you do that, I care not what other measures are passed, a country like this will have abundant prosperity. There was never a time in the history of the world when stability of prices prevailed and when the supply of money was adequate to the demands of any particular country that it did not have prosperity. An exception to this can not be named; it never has been found, and there can be no case cited in the history of the world where a general decline of prices did not bring adversity.

Liberty itself depends upon an adequate supply of money; the existence of our race depends upon it. The continuance of the gold standard will exterminate the American race. From the foundation of our Government, and since the days of the colonies, there has always been an opportunity for young men to go forth and build homes and secure independence until within the last twenty years. There was no danger of poverty as the result of marriage. The husband and the wife could go forth and by their joint efforts soon secure a home and maintain their independence. Homes were thus established from the Atlantic to the Pacific all over this great country.

The money famine from 1810 to 1850, in consequence of the Spanish-American wars, which interfered with mining for the precious metals, was disastrous to Europe, but was mitigated in this country by the settlement of the great Mississippi Valley. That famine was, as it were, bridged over by the mass of immigration which came into this country and made homes on the public domain. Millions came to this country with what money they had and saved us from the paralysis of contraction.

When young people are contemplating marriage the question discussed is, Can they take the risk of poverty? The question is ever present with them whether or not they can endure the inevitable struggle against poverty and want. There is no hope for the young and enterprising while general prices are falling. Their only escape from starvation is in servitude and dependence. This condition of our country is slowly but surely exterminating the prudent and thoughtful of our people. Only the ignorant and reckless will attempt to raise families under such conditions. If we continue this grinding process of contraction and falling prices, we destroy the independent family homes of our country.

Gibbon informs us that when Rome lost her liberty and the Dark Ages spread over Europe, the old Roman stock had become extinct. Hard conditions and falling prices had exterminated the race. They passed laws in Rome to compel marriage, but those laws were fruitless. If the facts could be known in this country, there can be no doubt that marriages among the intellectual classes during the last twenty years have decreased a very large per cent. Education counts for nothing against contraction and falling prices. It is easy to tear down, but you can not build up by education unless you give the people the means of making homes and becoming independent. It is an old saying that starving men never maintained a republic, and they never will. Those who are feasting on the misfortunes of their fellows, those who are growing rich on the enhanced value of money, may prosper for a time; but if history is true, they will eventually go down in the common ruin.

We hear much talk about anarchy and anarchists in this country. Anarchy always begins at the top; anarchy begins at the head. Anarchy is the result of misrule. There were no anarchists in this country for a hundred years. This was a sanitarium for anarchists. Men who had become partially insane by reason of intolerable oppression in other lands came here, saw hope, and became good citizens and patriots.

I have heard it frequently said in fashionable society that we need a stronger government to put down anarchists. Such talk is very popular among the goldbug orators, who call the six and one-half millions who voted for reform at the last Presidential election anarchists. You can make anarchists by bad laws; you can tear down and oppress; but, like Samson, you will pull down the temple itself.

When the Roman usurers had sold the Roman people into slavery, when they had reduced the masses to slavery, they perished in the common ruin.

So long as the same unjust conditions prevail, disaster must follow. Revolution and turmoil are the outgrowth of injustice. Let every man feel that he has an interest in the Government; that it is an honest government; that it gives him an equal show, and love of country and patriotism will triumph.

The sentiment in this country against anarchy is still strong; it is still reliable. It was once invincible. The local authorities everywhere could take care of anarchists. If anarchy is dangerous now, it is dangerous because you have changed the instrument of distribution and prevented the masses from obtaining money with which to supply the necessities of life; it is because you have stifled production, because you have doubled all contracts payable in money. That is what the people feel. View it as you will, laugh at it as you may, call it a disposition to tear down the Government, call the people anarchists, call them what you please, I appeal to you not to do what despots have done. If you do, the same consequences will follow.

In this war with Spain, if you will furnish the money, let business prosper, and make it possible for the people to pay taxes, $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 a year would not be oppressive. Business is now stagnant, and your revenue must rest on business. You want revenue from business, and yet you stifle business by contraction. There can be no more cunning, no more effective device, no more wicked contrivance, than to contract the volume of money at this time by offering bonds to absorb the money of the country while you increase taxation.

I gave notice of an amendment of the character devised by Madison and used heretofore on many great occasions. My amendment provides for the issuance of Treasury notes, running one year, and receivable for Government dues. If that policy should be adopted, it would enable the people to pay taxes, and the taxes would not be oppressive. That was done during the war of 1812. Van Buren did it; it was done under Tyler; and it was the method adopted by Polk during the Mexican war. We should let the people have a chance to make money, so that they may be enabled to pay taxes. That would not affect your gold standard; but it would give the people a breathing spell, so that they might have an opportunity to recover themselves and not be always oppressed.

I think the bill as it came from the House of Representatives is the most cruel, heartless, foolish, wretched performance that ever emanated from a legislative body. Do you propose to pass a bill which will say to the people "We will take your last dollar and throw you into bankruptcy; we will give you no means of paying the taxes which we impose upon you; we will stop your business. While you are fighting the battles of your country, while you are giving your lives for the sake of the honor of your country, while you are exhibiting your patriotism and love of country, we will take advantage of your extremity, and take from you the money which you need to pay taxes while we load on taxes; we will issue bonds; we will retire the greenbacks; we will perfect our scheme, a part of which is the sale of bonds. We will accomplish that, and then we will have you in our power. Then you have got to do as we say and you have got to work for the wages we fix or you will be discharged." Then the corporations will have the people at their mercy. They can say, "You will be deprived of employment; your families will be starving, and you will have to accept the conditions which we propose to dictate. We do not propose that you shall have the same power to resist that you had in 1896. We are not going to give you as much as $20,000,000 the next time." Then we shall have starving men with starving families dependent upon them, and they can not have the courage of American citizens. Let the people have freedom, and then they will have the ability to pay taxes. Let every man feel that he is an American and that he has an interest in this country, but do not make him feel as if he were a born serf.

A republic is the strongest government in the world, where all the people have an interest; but when you take away their interest, it is the weakest. Why were not the Chinese patriotic? Because their Government robbed them, and they wanted to see it overthrown. Why was it that Alexander and the Roman generals could march over the oriental countries? Because their rulers had robbed the people and the money was in the hands of the few and citizenship was worthless. You can destroy a country, you can destroy its liberties and not only make the people anarchists and revolutionists, but you will finally reduce them to despair.

Make your taxation so that you can collect all the money you want. There is no limit to the amount of money that can be raised to whip Spain. If 25,000,000 people could pay $300,000,000 a year in internal taxes during the rebellion, 75,000,000, if you give them like conditions, give them money to do it, can pay $900,000,000 or $1,000,000,000 a year of internal revenue. There is no trouble at all if you will only give them the opportunity. But either one of these bills, if passed in connection with the bond bill, will be more oppressive than the taxes were during the war and more difficult to pay.

I beg you to remember that this Republic rests on equality of privileges. There is no limit to the patriotism, no limit to the growth, no limit to the advancement of this great Republic if you will equalize privileges; but it will decay and wither under the same forces that have destroyed the hope of man in all ages. The money type is the enemy. It has done more harm in contracting the volume of money than all other forces combined, and in the word "contraction" everything that can afflict human nature is involved. It has done more harm to humanity than all the crimes, all the wars, all the famines, and all the diseases together; and, in fact, leaving out the convulsions of nature, the manipulation of the money volume is the cause of nearly every other calamity. It starved to death 10,000,000 people in India in the last two years.

Mr. ALLEN. It starved 40,000,000.

Mr. STEWART. Probably 10,000,000 died in the famine.

Take our own boasted land of liberty. The number of people who are being destroyed by want and privation in this country is startling. The limit it has made upon the growth of population is more dreadful than a war. It will prevent in this decade the existence of more than 5,000,000 of lives. The next census will show it. It limits population, discourages marriages, and the people die of want and privation. Nobody knows the number of poor women and children who are suffering even to-day for food on account of the want of employment on the part of their husbands and sons. They attract no attention.

Peace mongers talk about the terrible horrors of war. The horrors of war are terrible. It is a terrible thing to have a few hundred or a few thousand of our bravest men killed, but you think nothing of it when you extinguish life by the thousands through starvation. The cruelty of prolonged peace under the rule of the money type is the cruelty of extermination. Rome prospered and grew great by war. The only enemy she could not conquer was the usurer. The only enemy which is dangerous to our country is the type of men which lives on usury and manipulates financial legislation. This bill as it came from the House is in the interest of the money type. As reported by the Finance Committee it is a bill to provide revenue for the war with Spain without impoverishing the people of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I shall not undertake to make a very close analysis of the pending bill nor enter into an extended discussion of its provisions. I shall content myself at this time with calling attention to a few obnoxious features and to pointing out, as best I can, why they should not be enacted into law. The discussion thus far has developed the fact that if the wishes of the different interests to be taxed are to be consulted the bill will be converted into a measure to authorize the issuance of bonds alone, and will carry with it no taxation whatever.

The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] but a day or two ago inveighed strongly against the imposition of a tax on corporations, claiming that it was unjust. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] also spoke strongly against the tax on corporations, as did the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. Corporations are protesting against the imposition of a tax on their franchise and property; and I do not myself see much distinction between a franchise and property. The manufacturers of patent medicines and proprietary articles are protesting against a tax on their wares. The transportation companies are protesting against a tax being imposed on them. The tobacco interests are protesting against so large a tax being imposed on them as the pending bill provides for. In fact every interest, every business that can reach this Chamber by telegrams and by letters is protesting that some other industry or some other business could better afford to be taxed than that particular business.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Nebraska pardon me for a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. My State is a very large tobacco State. There are only a few States that are largely interested in tobacco. Our people are not protesting against a tax on them similar and equal to what we put upon others. In fact they have not protested against the tax being raised from 6 cents to 12 cents, which is 100 per cent increase. They merely protest when it is proposed to put it as high as 16 cents, and even 100 per cent increase is a great hardship when it bears on only a few States in the Union. If all the States of the Union were tobacco States it would be a very different thing, but we are standing without protest a 100 per cent increase. We do not, however, want any more, for any more would be clearly unjust.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not see that the remark is very germane to my discussion, and I do not regard it as necessary to notice it any further. I was trying to make it appear, as I think it does, that every interest in the land, except the agriculturists and laborers, are protesting against the imposition of a tax upon their particular industry or occupation.

Mr. President, it ought to be gratifying to every American citizen to pay his equitable portion of the war tax. I do not for a moment admit that just and equitable taxation is a burden, and when writers speak of taxes as being a burden, I regard it as a misnomer, for every citizen and every industry ought to regard it as a privilege to pay his or its just and equitable portion of the money expended to support the National Government. We obtain our compensation for taxes paid presumably in the protection the Government affords us.

The Government extends to its citizens and over their property and their interests a certain protection by means of its existence, and for that the citizen pays his portion of the public taxation to support the Government. It is not a burden when justly and equitably levied and assessed against either persons or property. So it is if these different interests I have mentioned could have their way, the pending bill would be absolutely emasculated of every form of taxation and would be converted into a bill to increase the bonded indebtedness of the United States.

Yesterday we had a learned discussion by the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] on the Constitution, which is considered here so frequently. The Constitution is invoked on all occasions, not only in favor of certain measures, but against measures, as the convenience of the particular orator may require, and yesterday we were treated to a disquisition by the Senator from Kentucky on the constitutional powers of the State and National Governments to impose taxes. I hold, without referring to any judicial decisions or other authority, that there is no property and no individual or franchise in the United States that this Government may not lay a tax on, if necessity requires it, outside, possibly, of the mere administrative agencies of the respective

State and National Governments. They can not destroy themselves by taxation. But with that single exception the National Government can reach every individual of the 75,000,000 of our people, every dollar of money, and every article of property by appropriate taxation; and when it does it equitably, imposing a just tax upon persons and property, no man and no corporation and no interest has any right to complain.

Is there anything sinister, Mr. President, in this avowed purpose to escape taxation and to eliminate many of the tax features of this bill? It strikes me there is; and what is that purpose? It is to increase the interest-bearing debt of the country. If taxation can eliminate and take off of corporations and the tax on proprietary articles and on different articles embraced in this bill can be defeated, a void will be created which can be filled only by the issuance of greenbacks or interest-bearing bonds to augment the present bonded indebtedness of the nation. I have no hesitancy, sir, in stating that it is my belief that that is the motive underlying to a very great extent the opposition to the taxing features of the bill.

I shall not discuss the money question in all its various features, but I will endeavor to point out before I conclude wherein the United States can obtain ample money with which to conduct the war without the issuance of an interest-bearing obligation in any form. But before I do so I wish to call attention to a notable exception to the corporations that do not want to be taxed. I wish to call attention to one corporation that has expressed to me in writing, in the form of a dispatch, a desire to bear its full portion of the added taxation with which to successfully conduct the war. It is so exceptional and so rare and refreshing that I feel I ought to read the dispatch. I read:

Hon. W. V. ALLEN, Washington, D. C.

NEW YORK, May 25, 1898.

The beet-sugar manufacturers of the United States do not ask and do not want to be excluded from paying their just share of the war taxes along with other corporations, should such a tax be imposed.

HENRY T. OXNARD, President.

Mr. President, it is truly gratifying to find a great industry like the American Beet Sugar Company coming forward and taking a patriotic stand at this time and saying to Congress, "We do not desire to escape taxation, but as patriotic citizens we want to bear our full portion of the public burden and contribute dollar for dollar our equitable and just portion of taxation." How strongly this is in contrast to the telegrams and letters we receive from all over the country protesting against the imposition of a tax upon this particular corporation and that particular corporation and this particular interest and that particular interest. Mr. President, it would seem, if we are to follow the advice or request of some of the gentlemen representing corporations and some of these interests, that the Government would be absolutely paralyzed for want of money. We would not be able to raise a dollar to conduct this war in which we are all so deeply interested.

But bonds, interest-bearing obligations, are what is wanted, say some Senators, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] yesterday said that he thought it was just that the burdens of the war should be distributed down through the years—that this generation should not bear the entire burden. That is the argument of cowardice. There is no other word that fittingly expresses it. Every generation of Americans should care for itself and pay its own obligations. It would be absolutely cowardly, inexcusably cowardly, to suffer the transmission to our posterity of a great national debt, to rest as a blight upon them and their industries. Why should we transmit to another generation the obligations growing out of this war and the duties imposed by it?

No, Mr. President, the great masses of the people desire to pay as they go. They are willing to pay their just portion of taxes, and they do not want this Government at the end of the war indebted one dollar more than it is at the present time. But a patriotic wave is sweeping over the country; the people are moved as they have not been for a third of a century before, and, taking advantage of it, the infamous money power of the United States and Europe is endeavoring to foist upon the people a perpetual national debt. I say "infamous," because it is infamous and because it is destructive of human liberty and its mission is to destroy liberty. There is not one of that power, sir, who would not see this Government sunk to the bottom of the ocean if he could make a fortune by it. There is not an impulse of patriotism, not a feeling of affection for the Government among them. The Government is to them simply a carcass upon which they are to feed and fatten.

Mr. President, who has pointed out a necessity for the issuance of bonds, and who can point out the necessity for it? We may go through the ledgerdom of politics that is exhibited here so frequently, pointing to the difference between gold and silver and paper money where there is in fact no difference. We may try to blind the eyes of the people by a process of pettifoggery, but it will not succeed. There is no cause for the issuance of interest-bearing obligations, and the people are not so blind but that they will see the iniquity of an issuance if it takes place. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said in his opening statement a few days ago that this bill as drafted by the Senate Finance Committee would give a net increase of $152,481,806.

The Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. DINGLEY, of Dingley bill notoriety, tell us that the war would cost about three hundred millions annually extra, and legislating on the supposition that the war is to last a year, we have to raise only $300,000,000 in addition to the ordinary revenues of the Government, unless the deficit of sixty-odd millions under the Dingley tariff act is to be covered up by the bill. One hundred and fifty-two million four hundred and eighty-one thousand three hundred and six dollars extra revenue by taxation can be derived from this measure. Add to that the money in the Treasury this morning, amounting to $205,273,976.26, and there will be a total with which to conduct the war of $357,755,282.26, or $57,755,282.26 more than is necessary. To this, Mr. President, we can add forty-two millions by the coinage of the silver seigniorage in the Treasury. We can, by reenacting the income-tax provisions of the tariff act of August, 1894, increase the revenues forty millions more, and by the issuance of $150,000,000 of greenbacks can make the grand total of extraordinary revenue for the year $559,755,282.26, or $289,755,282.26 more than is necessary to conduct the war to a successful termination.

Now, under such circumstances, can any gentleman justify himself in voting to give the Secretary of the Treasury power to issue bonds? And it is significant with what seeming cunning the author of this bill has distinguished between bonds and certificates of indebtedness. They each bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent. They are the obligations of the Government and must be paid by taxes levied from the people. If there is any gentleman in this Chamber who can point out a legal distinction between a Government bond bearing 3 per cent interest and a certificate of indebtedness bearing a like interest, I would be pleased to stop now and have him do so.

No, Mr. President, there is no distinction. An obligation which can be enforced, whether we call it a bond, a note, a check, or an ordinary contract or a certificate of indebtedness, has the same legal force if the terms of the instrument carry with it the same obligation, and you can not deceive the American people by saying that $300,000,000 is to be bonds and $100,000,000 is to be certificates of indebtedness. Be honest with them, gentlemen. Do not try to secrete the truth from them. Tell them that you mean to impose on them interest-bearing obligations to the amount of $400,000,000 in addition to the thousand millions they are carrying now.

Mr. President, if we authorize the issuance of $400,000,000 more of bonds we will have placed the bonded indebtedness of the country at over half what it was at the close of the late civil war. We will make it almost thirteen hundred million dollars, and I think in round numbers it was only twenty-three hundred million dollars at the close of the war, making something like twenty-eight hundred million dollars with the noninterest-bearing obligations added.

But Senators say it would not be a wise thing to do to coin the seigniorage. Why not, Mr. President? Can any gentleman point out in what respect there would be a lack of wisdom in coining the silver seigniorage in the Treasury? No, Mr. President, that man does not occupy a seat in this Chamber, unless he shall adopt the hackneyed and exploded theory that there is a difference between coin money and a limited volume of paper money having the same legal functions.

I heard a Senator say this morning in this Chamber, possibly it was yesterday, that silver had depreciated; and we hear it all over the country among a class of men who would enslave the American people by a perpetual interest-bearing debt. They say that silver has depreciated. Mr. President, silver has not depreciated in the slightest degree. There has been no practical depreciation in silver for years. Simply by cutting the cord that existed between silver and gold and casting all the money work upon gold alone, gold has risen and silver has stood still. It is the appreciation of gold and not the depreciation of silver that has made the difference.

Even the present Secretary of the Treasury, whose financial career has been confined until recently to the back parlor of a bank in Chicago, in a circular recently issued, Circular No. 143, on page 16, says:

Gold coins and standard silver dollars, being the standard coin of the United States, are not redeemable.

He goes on into quite a discussion of the standard silver dollar and standard gold coin. Does any man doubt that, if we will give silver the same office we give gold, if we will coin silver without limitation and make it a full legal tender for all debts public and private, it will stand as coin money upon a parity with gold in all respects?

Mr. President, it is the office or function of circulation and exchange performed by money that gives it its value. I have no patience, absolutely no patience whatever, with that class of pseudo financiers who argue that the value of money resides in the commercial value of the material employed. We can displace every dollar of silver and gold in the United States and replace them with full legal-tender paper money, and if we limit that volume, every paper dollar will be equivalent in value to a dollar in gold.

Gold and silver are valuable over paper only in so far as nature has regulated the output and made it impossible for man to increase it; but regulate the volume of paper and coin at the same point and the paper dollar will be worth as much, will buy as much, and pay as much wages and indebtedness as the gold dollar. And yet, Mr. President, we hear goldbugs calling for gold all the time, and they tell us that we must have the money of the world, when they know there is no such thing as money of the world. There is but a single instance I can now recall where, in modern times, there was anything like the money of the world, and that was paper money that was issued by England and the joint powers in the wars against Napoleon, and from that sprang the English pound note that is so popular to-day.

Mr. President, $42,000,000 of additional silver money would be absorbed without anyone noticing it. There is not a State in the Union where it would not be absorbed without creating a wave in commercial or industrial circles. The people would take it readily. The man who holds the plow and wields the ax and the hoe and spade will take it and be glad of the opportunity. It will bring relief to hundreds and thousands, yea, millions, of oppressed American citizens to-day. But the banker does not want it, the stockbroker does not want it, the gambler in money does not want it; and as the money gambler rules politics and controls the political throne, he is to be consulted and his wishes followed by the party in power.

Then, Mr. President, we can raise $40,000,000 more by imposing an income tax. It may be said that the Supreme Court have decided the income tax to be unconstitutional, and therefore we should bow to the decision. I would give them an opportunity to decide it again. The Supreme Court left the impression in their decision that in the event of war or of unusual conditions Congress would have power to impose an income tax. Here exists the exact condition described by them, an exceptional condition, a great public exigency created by the existence of war with a foreign country. Let us revive the income features of the tariff act of 1894, and by that means increase the annual revenues $40,000,000.

Mr. President, I have proposed and shall offer at the proper time the following as a substitute for section 27 of the pending bill:

That so much of the act of August 27, A. D. 1894, entitled "An act to reduce taxation, provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," as relates to the levying and collection of an income tax be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted; and it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to collect the income tax therein imposed, beginning with the fiscal year commencing the 1st day of July, 1898; and all provisions of said act necessary and proper to carry out the purpose hereof and to administer said law are hereby revived and reenacted.

Let that be done, Mr. President, and it will remove any necessity for the issuance of any kind of interest-bearing obligations. The Supreme Court have said it can be done. If they say it shall not be done, they will be required to overrule the latest decision they have made on the subject. Of course they can overrule a decision very easily, as we well know. For one hundred years an income tax had been held constitutional by the Supreme Court, beginning with the Hylton case, in 8 Dallas and ending in 1883, I think, with the Springer case, in 103 United States Reports. In five different cases the Supreme Court has passed on the constitutionality of an income tax and held it to be constitutional.

Mr. TELLER. Unanimously every time.

Mr. ALLEN. Unanimously every time. The income tax had passed successfully in review before every Chief Justice of the Supreme Court excepting Ellsworth, I think, who had not taken his seat when the Hylton case was decided. It had passed successfully in review before forty of the most eminent associate justices who have ever occupied seats on the Supreme Bench. They reviewed it carefully, and held the Government had the constitutional power to impose an income tax; but it was reserved for the present distinguished jurist who occupies the office of Chief Justice, and a bare majority of his associates, to discover that all their predecessors and all the great lawyers of the nation for a hundred years had been mistaken, and that the Congress did not have constitutional power to impose a tax on incomes, and therefore the tax was void.

And whoever yet has discovered the marvelous change of opinion in that court within a few short weeks? Has that been explained to the world? One of the justices held the act to be constitutional in an elaborate opinion, and within a few days thereafter discovered that he was wrong and changed his mind and voted to hold the entire act unconstitutional. Marvelous change of judgment! Marvelous change of heart!

Mr. President, the fact that a man occupies a position on the Supreme Bench of the United States, or on any other bench, does not make him a true man unless he is such before he goes there. No man has ever yet discovered, or, if he has, has explained to the world, that marvelous change of opinion. I would rather take a pick and go upon the highways and earn my living by digging in the streets at a dollar a day than to have rest on me the suspicion that in a judicial position I had changed my mind on a question of law for the accommodation of any particular industry in this or in any other country. Who were interested in preventing the income tax from being enforced? The great manufacturers and corporations; and rumor has it that the justice who changed his mind comes from one of the most highly protected States in the Union. What synthetic relation there may be between that and his change of opinion I do not know and I do not care to suggest.

Mr. President, it is deplorable when the people of a country like this lose confidence in their judiciary. Does any man doubt that politics rules the Supreme Court of the United States in some cases as much as it does in this Chamber and in the other branch of Congress? Decisions are made and handed down by that tribunal which rest upon nothing but mere party politics. Law is abandoned, justice is abandoned and thrown aside, and the court renders a decision, a political decision, just as our Republican friends and a few of their Democratic allies will in a few days vote bonds upon the country through political motives. The question of justice has nothing to do with it. It becomes a question of expediency and party policy. Is it not deplorable, sir, when the little boys and little girls of a nation are taught at the fireside to suspicion high judicial tribunals of being actuated by unworthy motives? How long can a government exist in its original purity and integrity where such a suspicion exists? And have they cause for suspicion? Go back, if you will, to the electoral decision of 1877.

Mr. President, I do not believe there is an intelligent human being in the United States who does not believe that Mr. Tilden was honestly elected to the Presidency and was entitled to his seat. The great mass of the people, I think, believe so. They certainly do in many sections of the country, regardless of politics. And yet some of the judges of the Supreme Court were taken from their high position and placed upon an unconstitutional commission for the purpose of deciding a question over which they and no other tribunal but Congress had jurisdiction. Who does not remember the result? Election return after election return was overturned and their force destroyed; every rule of evidence made to safeguard the administration of justice was ignored, and the tribunal stood 8 to 7, just according to the partisan politics of the persons composing that commission.

Mr. President, I do not believe there is any man who has any respect for the decision of that commission. It was partisan; it was intended to be partisan; it was created for the purpose of defrauding the man justly elected out of his position; and it succeeded; and yet it has its apologists even to-day.

So the judges of our courts are called from their designated duties to perform others entirely distinct from the offices for which they were selected. A short time ago, within the last two years, there was created what is called the Venezuelan Commission, to ascertain the boundary between British Guiana and Venezuela. Who does not recall the lurid message sent to us by the late prophet of the White House? We voted on the spur of the moment $100,000 to authorize him to create a commission to determine where the true boundary line was, and he formed it.

He took two justices, one of the justices of the District supreme court and one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, from their duties and made them a part of that commission. The $100,000 has melted to a very few thousand. There are ten or twelve useless clerks drawing money from it constantly; doing nothing, absolutely nothing, and drawing salaries all the time. No report has been made. Do you suppose there will be a dollar of the appropriation left? No, Mr. President, it will be squandered. That money was illy spent, and it was ill advised to take a member of a court from his proper duties and make him a member of the commission. So we had a treaty of amity, and it was sought to transfer some members of the Supreme Court to it, or add to their duties the duties of judges of a great international court of arbitration, to be contaminated by eastern policies.

Mr. President, it is surprising under circumstances such as these that the people are becoming suspicious of the highest judicial tribunal in the United States? I do not speak of these things for the purpose of saying that the Supreme Court is particularly different from any other tribunal. I speak of it to show that our highest national organizations are becoming honeycombed with what I regard as political decay. It is so of Congress. No man can walk into this Chamber and not feel the heated political atmosphere the moment he opens the door.

Mr. President, he knows the instant he enters one of these doors that Congress is not legislating for the people. He understands that here it is a game of party politics from the opening of Congress to its closing; a sparring for political position and advantage; an attempt to put forward this particular party, or to put that particular party in a hole. The legislation of this nation for two years could all be done in four months' time. If we would come here as a business organization, forgetting politics for the time, and sit down and legislate for the country, four months would be ample time to enact every law necessary for this Government for two years; and yet we have a long session running six and seven and eight months at a time and at other times longer, and then a short session of three months; and Congress is always behind, because it wastes its time in considering mere party questions.

So this laxity, this moral laxity, exists in Congress, in the Supreme Court, in the lower judicial tribunals, and I presume in other Departments.

Now, we are told, and it is simply a falsehood upon its face, that it is necessary to issue interest-bearing bonds with which to conduct this war. There is no necessity for bonds. There is but one class of people who call for them and they are the money power, Mr. President, which dominates both branches of Congress. I say in absolute humiliation and in shame that this branch of Congress and the other is controlled by the money power and the voice of the people is here stifled or treated with contempt, if heard at all.

We might add $40,000,000 more by the adoption of this amendment, and then we can supply $150,000,000, and I think it ought to be $200,000,000, by the issuance of greenbacks, thus giving a surplus, as I said a moment ago, of $289,755,283.26. Who can claim that under such circumstances it will be wise to authorize the issuance of bonds?

But, Mr. President, this means more. It means an interest, if these bonds are not paid—an interest charge to the people of the United States of $120,000,000 during the next ten years, making $520,000,000 when the bonds are paid. It means even more than that. It means that at the end of ten years there will be no money in the Treasury with which to pay the bonds. They will be refunded and go on from year to year as a great blanket mortgage upon the property and industries of the country.

Mr. President, when Grover Cleveland, late of Buffalo, came into power the second time, the annual interest charge to the United States was about $23,000,000, possibly a little more than that. After four years of the delights and sweets and blessings of the gold standard under his Administration the annual interest charge to the United States grew to about $34,000,000. Suppose Mr. Cleveland had followed out the platform and tenets of his party and had kept the promises made in this Chamber in 1893 by his representatives, and had caused silver to be coined freely and upon terms of equality with gold, there would not have been the slightest necessity for increasing the bonded indebtedness $263,000,000, as was done. Now it is proposed by this bill to increase the annual interest charge to the Government $12,000,000 more, or to about $46,000,000 annually.

Mr. President, when we are discussing the gold question, I should like to know from the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who is in charge of this bill, or from any other Senator of the Finance Committee, where we are to obtain the gold with which to pay these bonds, and how we are to obtain it? The drain upon the gold of the United States amounts to $325,000,000 annually; and where is it to come from, unless we are to enter upon a period of endless issues of gold-bearing obligations until the credit of the nation shall be broken down and the people and the Government shall go into bankruptcy?

England and other nations of Europe take from us every year $325,000,000 in gold, or gold equivalent in the form of interest charges, transportation charges, and expenditures of money by American citizens visiting abroad. Our annual output of gold amounts to about $42,000,000, one-half of which is consumed in the arts, or practically one-half. How are we to obtain the gold to pay these enormous charges, to say nothing about paying the principal of the debt when it falls due?

My honorable friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] complained about this a few moments ago, and said that our civilization was being reduced by it. Mr. President, unfortunately that statement is true. I wanted then to call his attention, as I call it now, to the fact that it is the purpose of the gold power to reduce the civilization of America; it is the purpose of this power to wield such an influence over our institutions and our people, that they will be made mere hewers of wood and drawers of water.

Does any man need an illustration more completely than is to be found in the last Presidential election? It has been charged, and never disputed, that $16,000,000 were used by the Republican party to carry that election—$16,000,000 to carry a party into power in a Government where the ballot is supposed to be free and where every man is supposed to vote without interference or interruption; and yet so open and so notorious has become this political prostitution that these charges pass unrefuted.

Mr. President, the civilization of the United States is involved in the issue. If the great mass of the people can be kept working and toiling year by year, yielding all above what is necessary for mere existence from their surplus earnings to this gold power, to pay interest charges and debts, that is exactly what that power wants; that is exactly what it has endeavored to accomplish, and what it has almost succeeded in accomplishing. The Senator from Nevada need have no concern about it accomplishing its purpose unless there is virtue enough in the American people to rise up and shake off this influence effectually.

Mr. President, a tidal wave of patriotism is rolling over the country. The "peace-at-any-price men" of four or five weeks ago are leading in the war to-day. The men who were laggards five weeks ago, saying the country should compromise its honor, should compromise everything for peace, and permit the women and children of Cuba to starve by thousands, as they are starving now—and before we get into Cuba they will all be gone by starvation—those men have put themselves at the head of the procession, and are carrying the flag, and we are in the rear, beating the drums and sounding the fife.

Mr. President, the Moloch of greed is to be satisfied at any price. On the 21st of last month we declared on high Christian grounds, on grounds of civilization—even earlier than that, I think—that we would intervene in the affairs between Spain and Cuba to put a stop to unspeakable cruelty. Within 96 miles of our shores 500,000 old men, boys, women, children, and sucklings had been starved to death. The civilized world would not stand it longer. But here we were, the giant of the Western Continent, and I think when properly organized the most powerful nation on earth in all respects, sitting down supinely, watching the process of extermination go on in Cuba with scarcely a protest against it.

After a time, Mr. President, there came a quickened public sentiment and a demand that something be done; and we all remember how the peace-at-any-price men skirmished for delay—delay until the people of Cuba could be compelled to assume a $500,000,000 interest-bearing obligation. When that did not succeed, the peace-at-any-price men fell in and put themselves at the head of the procession, and they have been running the war since then.

Mr. President, when will the war terminate? If it closes when the bond and franchise syndicate determines it shall, it will close only when they force from the remnants of the people of Cuba and the other islands financial conditions which will satisfy them; and it will not terminate sooner than that unless there is a popular uprising that can not be resisted. So we are marching under the gold standard to-day, if at all, and our fleets are sailing under the standard of the peace-at-any-price men. Every interest of our country, even the patriotism of the country, must be coined into obligations bearing interest when there is not the slightest necessity for it.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask permission to have a bill laid before the Senate?

Mr. ALLEN. For action?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. I can not suffer an interruption to pass a bill at this time, because I am nearly through, and I would not want my remarks so ruthlessly cut in two and so unceremoniously destroyed. I shall be through in a moment.

I want to put myself on record as being now, as I have always been, against the issuance of bonds at all, and I hope to see the time come when Congress will have patriotism enough in both branches of it to take away the power from the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds, unless specifically authorized to do so. When there is a necessity, Mr. President, for the issuance of bonds and that necessity is presented to Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury will never be without it. Congress will confer that authority whenever it is necessary, but it is a most dangerous power to place in the hands of a subordinate officer. The Constitution devolves on Congress the whole financial policy of the nation—the power to tax, the power to raise revenue, the power to coin money, the power to emit bills of credit, the power to control the entire financial policy of the nation—and is it possible, Mr. President, that there is more wisdom in an average Secretary of the Treasury than there is in both branches of Congress?

A continuing power to issue bonds never would have been given in the early days of the Republic. And yet the Secretaries of the Treasury have desired so much to use the power that they have issued bonds in absolute violation of law. There was not a bond issued of the $262,600,000 under the Administration of Grover Cleveland that is not absolutely void. John G. Carlisle had no more power to issue bonds than my distinguished friend from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY] had at that time or at this.

There is not a word in the statutes, and there was not a word there then, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds; and I say in the face of his friends here that he violated the duties of his office and the Constitution of the United States when he issued those bonds. Yet so strong is this power, that that man, who had been the champion of silver for years in this Chamber and outside of it, bowed to its yoke, and exceeded his authority in the issuance of bonds, simply to placate the money power.

What is to be expected, Mr. President, of a country where a thing of that kind can take place with impunity? Does not every man know that civilization is imperiled when a great public officer, in defiance of his duty, in violation of the statute, in violation of the Constitution, can create a debt for the people to pay, that will be a burden on them for generations to come?

We are likewise informed that the present Secretary of the Treasury thinks he has the power to issue bonds. No doubt he thinks so. He represents simply one class of people, and that is the cent-per-cent class so aptly described by Mr. Dickens in the Veneering family. Do you suppose the Secretary of the Treasury for a moment thinks of the man who toils and labors and struggles for a living? He cares no more for him than for a beast of burden. He is only one of the small factors in the accumulation of wealth. And yet it is true that no man can become the head of the Treasury Department of the United States who does not go there as the pet of this particular money power and to administer the affairs of the Government in its interests.

I have nothing to fear from the Secretary of the Treasury, and I certainly have no love for his administration of his office. I say that his policy is to keep up the interest obligations on the people until every man, woman, and child of the 75,000,000, and the 100,000,000 that are to come pretty soon, will be the bond slave and the servant of the few, and our Government will pass, as it is rapidly passing to-day, from a Republic to an offensive aristocracy.

I have nothing to say as to the policy we are likely to pursue in the present war. It would not be proper for me to criticize what has been done or what has not been done thus far. I do not propose by anything I may say at this time or at any other time to lay any obstruction in the road of the President of the United States in conducting this war to a successful termination. I can not, however, resist the temptation of calling attention incidentally to this fact, to which I have before referred, I think, during my remarks.

We started out to relieve the reconcentrados of Cuba, who were starving to death, who, I am informed by competent and proper authority, are now dying by the thousands daily, and we have not taken to them one morsel of bread, nor a particle of raiment, nor a cup of water with which to assuage their thirst. They are suffered to die to-day, as they were dying months ago. The very purpose for which this war was inaugurated—to carry out a Christian civilization and to relieve those people—has been abandoned, and they are suffered to starve more effectually than they were before war was declared.

Mr. President, I will vote every dollar and every man necessary to successfully conduct the war. I feel somewhat interested in it because I received from the effete East a day or two ago a newspaper clipping, saying that Populist ALLEN from Nebraska was largely responsible for the agitation that brought about the war and wanting to know why I did not enter the Army. Mr. President, you know there are a great many patriots nowadays who are not particularly concerned about going into the Army themselves, but desire somebody else to do so.

I served through one war. I think I had the honor of being in a battle where you and I, Mr. President [Mr. MILLS in the chair], were on opposing sides; and yet, as I said to my amiable and good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] some weeks ago, if it becomes necessary to have more men, I will resign my position if he will resign his, and we will take our muskets and go side by side as private soldiers and discharge our duty as best we can.

Mr. SPOONER. That strikes me as a very poor sort of patriotism.

Mr. ALLEN. It may be, but I think otherwise.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is willing, if it becomes necessary in order to serve the Government and vindicate the national honor, to go into the Army for that purpose, if somebody else will also go.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator and I served about the same length of time in the last war on the same side, but the Senator was wearing shoulder straps at that time, and I was carrying a musket and a knapsack.

Mr. SPOONER. I served a while without any shoulder straps, or any other adornment except a knapsack.

Mr. ALLEN. Not very long.

Mr. SPOONER. Long enough.

Mr. ALLEN. Not long enough to injure you. The Senator was riding a horse and was drawing a good salary, and he had a servant to cook for him, and all those things. I did not. I was the fellow who carried the knapsack and the gun.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps you cooked.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I was the man who carried a knapsack and a gun; and I walked; I did not ride. I cooked sometimes, too.

Mr. SPOONER. Nor did I ever ride. I walked.

Mr. ALLEN. You had a right to ride.

Mr. SPOONER. I had no right to ride.

Mr. ALLEN. As a major?

Mr. SPOONER. I was not a major.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I beg your pardon.

Mr. SPOONER. I was a captain of an infantry company and marched with my company.

Mr. ALLEN. But you did not have to carry any knapsack; I know that.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps I did not.

Mr. ALLEN. That is the reason I make the proposition I do to the Senator. We are about the same age, and I want to see him carry a musket, and I am willing to go with him and carry one, too. I do not want to be promoted to the position of assistant adjutant-general or assistant commissary-general or anything of that kind. My application is not on file. I want to go under these circumstances if it is necessary; but I say to my friend frankly that I do not want to go at my age unless it is necessary.

But, Mr. President, speaking seriously, there ought not to be a citizen of the United States who, as a last resort, would not be willing to lay his life upon the altar of his country in this great war against a nation whose people have for two thousand years been the known assassins of the world, that we may drive them from this continent, from the Philippines, from Cuba and Puerto Rico; and, Mr. President, if I had the power, I would drive them from the Canary Islands, the Cape Verde Islands, and from the Peninsula itself and destroy them, in the hope that out of their sickly civilization there might grow a greater and a better nation.

It is barely possible, sir, that the time has come, which was contemplated by certain men, when the struggle between the Anglo-Saxon and the Latin is at hand. It may be that we are entering that period where a long struggle, extending over years, is about to be entered upon with uncertain results. It was not altogether unwise in a distinguished English statesman to call attention a few days ago to the probable necessity of closer relations between the English-speaking and German-speaking peoples. And yet, Mr. President, I have taken, as I shall in the future, a firm stand against any alliance between this country and England until England shall be willing to do by Ireland what we do by our States—give them self-government and absolute home rule.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 10423) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the administration of justice in the Army," approved October 1, 1890, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 271) donating a condemned cannon to the Thirty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The bill (H. R. 9554) granting certain lands to the city of Santa Barbara, Cal., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 10220) to organize a hospital corps of the Navy of the United States, to define its duties and regulate its pay, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

STATISTICAL ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLS in the chair) laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 12,000 copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1897, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department; 3,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate, 6,000 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

UINTAH INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1883) for the appointment of a commission to make allotments of lands in severalty to Indians upon the Uintah Indian Reservation in Utah, and to obtain the cession to the United States of all lands within said reservation not so allotted; which were, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "of" and insert "consisting of not more than."

Page 2, line 9, strike out all after "be" down to and including "laws," in line 13, and insert:

Hold in trust by the United States for the purpose of sale to citizens thereof: Provided, That the United States shall pay no sum or amount whatever for said lands so ceded. Said lands shall be sold in such manner and in such quantities and for such prices as may be determined by Congress: Provided, That the amounts so received shall, in the aggregate, be sufficient to pay said Indians in full the amount agreed upon for said lands. All sums received from the sale of said lands shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States for said Indians, and shall be exclusively devoted to the use and benefit of the Indians having interests in the lands so ceded.

Page 3, line 7, strike out "twenty."

Mr. RAWLINS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill. The amendments made by the House of Representatives do not materially change the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS], that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the bill will lie over until to-morrow and that the amendments of the House of Representatives will be printed.

Mr. RAWLINS. These amendments were made at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior and were put on the bill in the House in order to conform it to his wishes. I do not see that there is any reason why the matter should not now be disposed of. It is expressly requested by the Secretary.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not quite understand how the lands are to be entered and sold. I do not wish to interpose any objection to the early consideration of the bill, but it will lead to some little debate.

Mr. RAWLINS. The lands will simply be disposed of as Congress may hereafter provide. It makes no provision as to how they shall be disposed of. That is deferred.

Mr. ALLISON. If it leads to no debate, I shall not object; but if it does, I shall interpose objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made by the House of Representatives.

The amendments were concurred in.

WAR REVENUE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, in order to carry on the war now existing between the United States and Spain it is necessary to have both men and money. The men we have, or can have. The young men of the nation have responded to the President's call in a manner to elicit the highest praise for the patriotism of the American youth. The second need is that which we are now attempting to supply. The pending measure has been denominated, and properly so, a war revenue bill. It is mainly a bill providing for internal taxes, with a bond feature attached.

The taxes are direct. They are levied upon a large variety of subjects, and I say that these taxes ought to be levied and these bonds ought to be issued under and according to the financial policy maintained by the Republican party. That party offers no new departure in the matter of financial policy. They are pledged to the maintenance of gold as a standard of value. That issue was fought out at the polls in 1896 and a majority of the American people have put their seal of approval upon the financial policy of the party in power. If they proposed anything novel or strange or involving a departure from their settled policy or a policy repudiated by the people, it would be our duty to look into and examine and carefully weigh the method of taxation which they propose.

Sir, in face of this war, in view of the absolute necessity of a speedy contribution by Congress of funds to carry it on, in view of the fact that the bill, at least as it came from the House, responds exactly, in my opinion, to the settled policy of the Republican party, to an old policy and not a strange policy—to a policy indorsed by the people—I think it is the duty of Congress to vote the supplies necessary to carry on the war substantially in compliance with the proposition of the prevailing party.

Mr. President, ingrafted upon this bill by the Senate committee are certain provisions to which I do not give my concurrence and which I think will breed trouble and litigation and be unproductive of the necessary funds to carry on the war. We must legislate in view of certain conditions. We must legislate in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. We must legislate in view of the fact that the bond and inheritance tax features of the Senate amendments will almost certainly be the subjects of litigation, and therefore of delay and embarrassment.

The first proposition with which we are confronted, of a character that in my opinion is a departure from the settled financial policy of any party, is a tax of a quarter of 1 per cent on the gross receipts of corporations. The next is an inheritance tax; and the third, which is a departure from the settled policy of that party in whose hands is the conduct of this war, is the coinage of the so-called seigniorage.

The tax, of whatever amount it may be, upon the gross receipts of corporations because they are corporations, upon the occupation of a corporation, as styled by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] and also defined by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], is a tax, in my opinion, upon the right to exist as a corporation, upon a franchise granted by a State, and in that particular I think the tax is violative of the principle of dual, sovereign, independent governments, made by the Constitution of the United States when it framed a general government for the whole and left the States that sovereignty which they have not delegated to the General Government nor prohibited them to exercise.

Mr. President, I contend that the tax on the franchise of corporations is violative of State sovereignty. Wherever an occupation or a calling derives its existence from a grant of a sovereign State—and the States are sovereign with respect to the General Government in this particular—that right, that privilege, that franchise, is unsusceptible of taxation by any other sovereignty. The reason given by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland to prove that the States can not tax an instrumentality of the Federal Government selected as a means of carrying one of its enumerated powers into execution is equally potent to prove, a converse, that the Federal Government can not tax an instrumentality selected by a State government as an appropriate means to carry into execution its reserved and conceded power.

I do not deduce the power of the State to grant corporate franchise by inheritance from England. It is immaterial to me whether the English Kingdom at that period had or had not the power to grant corporate franchise to the colonies. It is a right that inheres in sovereignty, it belongs to sovereignty, and when the colonies threw off their allegiance to Great Britain and established their independence by the sword, each, every, and all rights of sovereignty lodged in the States created out of the colonies. One of the rights is, and in the nature of things is bound to be, that certain occupations, certain employments, certain businesses, can be carried on by the citizen under the grant of the sovereign body.

A corporation is an artificial creation of the sovereign power. It is an artificial being, and the most essential characteristic of a corporation is its longevity or continued existence, and that is a character which can only emanate from the sovereign power. Every individual is free to follow the calling which his choice or his judgment dictates, but no aggregation of individuals can derive the power of continuity, perpetuity, and the privileges attaching to corporate existence unless it be by a grant from the sovereign State having dominion and control over the corporation.

Mr. President, what do we find? First, a license required by Congress to authorize corporate institutions to carry on the business that the State has authorized them to carry on. The State has authorized them. A license is a tax on the particular calling. In some countries it is considered to be a permission to carry on that calling. It is made unlawful in some States to carry on the business unless under the permit of a license, but when the State has already licensed the occupation, already granted the authority without which corporate business can not be carried on, what concern is it of the General Government to grant what they have no power to bestow in the first instance? No license to carry on a business authorized under State sovereignty can be granted by the Federal Government. It has no power in the premises to do so. It is ultra vires for the Federal Government, great as it is and powerful as it is, to do so.

The distinction seems to have been made, or attempted to have been made, in the argument of my honorable friend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] that because the Federal power was supreme in its enumerated grants, therefore the power of the State to tax Federal instrumentalities did not exist, but by virtue of this very supremacy the power existed to tax the instrumentalities of the States.

It makes no sort of difference whether the power of the Federal Government is supreme or not when you come to investigate the question as to whether or not the Federal power can lay its hand on callings and occupations existing as franchises under State authority, and tax them as such for the benefit of the General Government. The question is, Does the power exist? Not whether it is an enumerated supreme power possessed by the General Government. If there were a clash of the respective powers, of course the Federal power, being supreme, would prevail. The existence of the power being established, supremacy attaches.

Sir, it strikes me that this is a violent blow at State sovereignty and State autonomy. Let it be understood that the Federal arm of taxation extends to taxing all these different instrumentalities which the States call into being in order to carry out State purposes either of finance or of transportation or any other general purpose—let that be conceded, and you wipe out the State lines as with a sponge.

There is one authority—I shall not read many authorities—which I will read. I read from 11 Wallace, which states very clearly the distinction between the State powers reserved by them and the powers of the General Government. It has been stated over and over again, and from this statement of general principles, nobody denying the existence of them, it flows, according to my ideas, by irresistible inference, that the Federal power of taxation on State franchises must stop at the line of State sovereignty, and it can neither cross it by taxation nor by any other means. I read from 11 Wallace the case of Collector vs. Day. I do not know but that it has been already read. Commencing on page 126, I read part of that page and part of page 127:

We do not say the mere circumstance of the establishment of the judicial department, and the appointment of officers to administer the laws, being among the reserved powers of the State, disables the General Government from levying the tax, as that depends upon the special power "to lay and collect taxes," but it shows that it is an original inherent power never parted with, and in respect to which the supremacy of that Government does not exist, and is of no importance in determining the question; and further, that being an original and reserved power, and the judicial officers appointed under it being a means or instrumentality employed to carry it into effect, the right and necessity of its unimpaired exercise, and the exemption of the officer from taxation by the General Government stand upon as solid a ground, and are maintained by principles and reasons as cogent as those which led to the exemption of the Federal officer in Dobbins vs. The Commissioners of Erie from taxation by the State; for, in this respect, that is, in respect to the reserved powers, the State is as sovereign and independent as the General Government.

There is the broad principle announced in this decision:

And if the means and instrumentalities employed by that government to carry into operation the powers granted to it are, necessarily, and, for the sake of self-preservation, exempt from taxation by the States, why are not those of the States depending upon their reserve powers, for like reasons, equally exempt from Federal taxation?

Mr. President, I ask the gentlemen who framed this feature of the bill to answer the question propounded by the court in the extract from its opinion.

Their unimpaired existence in the one case is as essential as in the other. It is admitted that there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the General Government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the States from taxing the means and instrumentalities of that Government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implication, and is upheld by the great law of self-preservation; as any government, whose means employed in conducting its operations, if subject to the control of another and distinct government, can exist only at the mercy of that government. Of what avail are these means if another power may tax them at discretion?

This is the case of a tax of one-quarter of 1 per cent on the gross receipts of corporations. There is no inhibition, no limitation upon the extent of the power of the Federal Government to tax when it has authority to tax. It can tax any per cent. It can tax, therefore, any corporation of any State out of existence at will. There is the plain fact; that is the plain deduction from a conceded power on the part of the Federal Government to tax the State instrumentalities out of existence.

Mr. President, it seems to have been conceded or rather yielded in argument that the power of taxation by the Federal Government on State instrumentalities only extends to those instrumentalities of a corporate character that perform some part of a governmental function. Is that true? Is it not incumbent upon every State, in the due exercise of an unlimited discretion and judgment and sovereignty, to judge whether or not the best interests of the State are subserved by incorporating individuals? If it be so, where is the distinction between impairing the right of the State in the instance of taxing a corporation that does not actually exercise any distinct portion of State sovereignty and in the case where the corporation does exercise a portion of State sovereignty? Take the case of a railroad corporation, which has more powers than any corporation that I know of.

It has the power of eminent domain delegated to it by the State, but it is a private corporation all the same. It is partly engaged in a business for the private benefit of the stockholders and the owners of the route, and while the purpose to be achieved by the corporation is of a quasi-public character, how are you going to divide that part of the corporation which is public or has a public purpose from that other part of the corporation which has only a private purpose—that of gain?

Now, sir, when a State grants this extensive privilege of carrying on a business under a corporate name which is to last for periods beyond the lives of the individuals incorporated and to survive in their successors, and grants it the prerogative of continuance for a purpose that the State, in the State's discretion, judges to be of great value to its commonwealth, has the Federal Government any power to intervene to tax the instrumentality? I do not think it is a strained argument to involve all these corporations in the same scope and exempt them all from the power of the Federal Government for taxation purposes.

Mr. President, this is a tax upon gross receipts. In my opinion the tax smells of injustice. Some corporations have gross receipts over their expenditures and some have not, and in that case the taxation is not uniform. The only way to get at taxing them, if you could get rid of the decision of the Supreme Court, is to tax the net income of a corporation. You can not tax the franchise of a corporation. You can tax its property. But you can not tax it out of existence by taxing it because it is a corporation.

But you can tax the property, and not the privilege of being a corporation, which is the admitted condition under which the tax is levied. The proponents of this tax, it occurs to me, are in the horns of a dilemma. If it is a tax on the property, it is repugnant to the decision in the Pollock case. It is the levy of a direct tax, an income tax. If it is a tax on the franchise of being a corporation, then it is repugnant to the genius and spirit and letter of our Constitution, which, making the General Government supreme, left the States in the enjoyment of all rights not delegated to it by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to them.

There is no escape from this dilemma. They admit that it is not a tax on property, but they say it is a tax upon the occupation of being a corporation, measured by the gross receipts. Why, Mr. President, it does not make any difference how you measure it. You can even measure it with a bimetallic stick, or any other measurement, just so it is a tax upon that occupation.

This corporation tax singles out first transportation companies. Then it takes hold of banking corporations. Now, there is a license upon every corporation pursuing the calling of a banker in the first part of the measure; in the first section, I believe. Then, again, superadded to that is a tax of one forty-eighth of 1 per cent per month upon the average deposits of a banking corporation.

Now, Mr. President, in these times of war and depression deposits are apt to remain in the banks if business stagnates, and what is the construction of this particular part of the bill? Will you go on month by month and tax these average deposits, which may be the same deposits, for nobody is apt to deposit hereafter if capital is not remunerative? Will the bill operate as a standing tax of one-quarter of 1 per cent all the time on the same deposits if they are not renewed month by month on the average deposits?

Mr. President, it occurs to me that that is the most inequitable way of reaching at banks, if that is the object of the bill. Out of a spirit of hostility to banks comes this tax of a quarter of 1 per cent, and who are the depositors that it reaches? The depositors are generally poor people. The rich people keep their money going, and they are generally borrowers. The exploiters of commerce, the captains of industry, the men engaged in business, go to the savings banks with their two billion of capital to borrow money, and who are the depositors there? A body of poor men whose business is carried on in those institutions, by benevolent men in many instances, without charge. As a matter of course the tax falls upon each and every depositor in the savings banks.

This tax on deposits is a direct blow at the South. The national banks are not organized in the South to the extent that they are in the North and West. A great many State banks have risen up in the last few years. In 1895 I believe the capital of the State banks was $300,000,000. That capital must have swelled largely since then—I speak by mere conjecture—to at least $500,000,000 to-day, and banks with a capital of $500,000,000 ought to carry deposits of between eight hundred million dollars and a thousand million dollars.

And sir, those banks do not issue one single cent of currency. They are carried on upon the deposit and discount plan. They are remunerative or they would not spring up so rapidly. This tax reaches right down to the very essence and vitality of those institutions. They tax every single depositor in the State banks. It occurs to me that if the design was to reach this mysterious power called the money power, they have shot at one set of men and hit others. In shooting at the money power, if that was the aim, they have struck the depositors, 75 per cent of whom are men of ordinary means and poor men. That is the case entirely with the savings banks, and it is largely so with the banks of deposit.

Mr. President, why are banks singled out for this double taxation, licenses, taxes, and a quarter of 1 per cent upon the average deposits? How much these licenses will figure out I do not know, but anybody can tell what a quarter of 1 per cent is upon eight hundred million or one thousand million dollars. That is to be a constant and never-ending tax, paid month by month, and in that respect it amounts to more than a quarter of 1 per cent. It is not an annual tax, but it is a monthly tax.

These banks of deposit are absolutely essential and necessary to the conduct of business in the Southern States. They are the intermediary between the lender and the borrower; they keep all the capital of the community active; they supply the sinews to every industrial enterprise. They bank upon commercial assets as all banks bank upon commercial assets, and they do not constitute the terrific power against which these taxes are leveled, this great money power, for they do nothing but circulate the capital of the community. They circulate its credit, build up enterprises, make business active, and inspire confidence among the people; for, sir, there is no better educator that I know in any community than the lessons of commercial integrity and commercial probity that the small banks of deposit teach the people in the midst of which they are situated.

It teaches them to be prompt and punctual and honest in meeting their obligations, and that promptness and punctuality and honesty with which they meet their obligations they have to exact from others, so that the spirit of confidence and integrity is instilled into the community, and a bank, whether of deposit or issue of currency, is a blessing to any community in which it is established, and it is one of these instrumentalities of civilization without which we can not get along. Why, therefore, single these banks out at this juncture for these excessive taxations?

The amendment providing for an inheritance tax has passed the Committee of the Whole. It will come up again for consideration in the Senate. That tax is as liable to constitutional objections as is the tax upon banks as banks. There is no higher privilege granted by any civilized state than the privilege of inheritance.

The courts tell us that inheritance is not a natural right, that it is a right that we hold from the State. It is a right granted by the whole social body of which the inheritor or heir is a member. It is not conferred by natural right, because it is held by the judiciary at least that a man's dominion over his property ceases with his death, and all testamentary dispositions and intestate descent of property are governed and controlled and regulated by the municipal statute.

Now, Mr. President, without criticising that statement, I submit that as the jurisdiction of every State extends over and embraces every particle of property situated within its borders, as the descent of that property is by and according to the law of the State, and as that constitutes, therefore, a privilege and a franchise of the supreme character, where is derived the power of the Federal Government to tax this benevolent regulation of the State out of existence?

Will men hold their property from an ancestor at the will and caprice of the taxing power of the General Government? Are we so wrung for money, so pressed for means to combat successfully with the power with which we are at war, that we have even got to invade the domain of the benevolence of fathers for children, husbands for wives, and lay upon them this tax upon the personality that they derive from them? I think not, Mr. President.

I think that the inheritance tax, as well as the taxes upon corporations, is utterly indefensible, both in point of law and in point of policy. There is nothing perfect about this inheritance tax but its inequality, its lack of uniformity. You tax a certain man so much money—for $10,000, $20; and you say all over $10,000 shall be taxed $40.

Ten thousand and one dollars, therefore, would pay $40, and $10,000 would pay $20. There is your inequality. There is no uniformity in this tax. It has been held that under the State power which grants the privilege of inheritance the State can classify the heir and can put upon each class a tax which may not be uniform with another class, but, sir, that is a power of the State. It is not a power of the Federal Government. If we tax inheritances at all, or if there is any power in the Constitution to tax them, you must tax them under the rule of uniformity laid down to be observed in regard to all other taxes.

Mr. President, I do not propose to say much on the question of seigniorage. I do not want to provoke any discussion upon the monetary topic which has been discussed for the last twenty years. But as the Republican party in power has an established policy which I say is that of maintenance of the gold standard, I submit to my brethren who desire the seigniorage coined that in view of the maintenance of that standard you can not coin the seigniorage. First, because there is no seigniorage.

We have about 109,000,000 ounces of silver, which cost about $99,000,000. The present worth of it is about 44 cents on the dollar. According to that calculation, you have not only no seigniorage, but you are large losers by the purchase. On what is called seigniorage you have lost about $56,000,000, and you say that the seigniorage calculated is about $42,000,000.

Mr. President, I submit that in this emergency of war we can not turn aside and discuss these money questions, which were discussed at the polls, and which were settled, temporarily at least, in favor of the party in power. We can not attempt at this period to inject into this bill the monetary views held by a large number of the members of the Senate.

There is absolutely nothing to coin. We say, whether correctly or not, that silver has declined by natural and legitimate causes. We say that the silver is worth only about 44 cents on the dollar. We say that, taking that calculation, we have lost money—a little more than half the amount that we paid for it. Why, therefore, attempt to inject the peculiar views of the gentlemen who hold to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 into a bill framed by the opponents and antagonists of that view, and upon whom rests the responsibility for this measure? Mr. President, while this is the nation's war, and while it is the war of every American, the conduct of the war is in the hands of the Republican party. We must hold up their hands. We can not hamper them in their just endeavor to furnish the necessary sinews of war.

I say, sir, that the war is ours, and I say whatever differences of opinion there may have been in regard to the inauguration of hostilities, the noble sentiment of that noble Decatur, whose successor in the same service has cast imperishable luster upon our arms at Manila, is the sentiment that ought to fill every American breast in regard to this war and in the measures for its conduct. "Our country," said Decatur, "may she be always right; but our country, right or wrong." And, sir, when this war is the common war of the American nation against the Kingdom of Spain, and when the party charged with the responsibility of the proper conduct of the war demands not something new, only demands finances according to its established policy, I for one stand ready to grant that demand.

Then, sir, we are asked to issue $150,000,000 of greenbacks. That to me is a most extraordinary demand. The argument has been made in favor of the greenbacks upon the ground that they are cheap money; that they save interest to the people. Why, Mr. President, that goes down to the very root of the controversy between the adherents of the gold standard and those who maintain that the Government can issue money by its fiat. Cheap money? Can that which is not money ever be cheap money? Has not the experience of the United States, as well as the experience of every civilized nation, taught us that this so-called cheap money is the dearest money that a nation ever issued? We have trouble enough, as was stated in argument yesterday upon this question, in regard to maintaining the gold reserve with $340,000,000 of greenbacks in existence. Now, we do not want to supplement that trouble by adding $150,000,000 more of greenbacks. There is not a civilized nation on the globe but ours that has not funded its war debt. Our greenbacks are hard to get rid of.

I was struck, Mr. President, by the very eloquent speech made by my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] in regard to the magnificent manner in which the French nation had responded to the call of the Government for a loan to pay the indemnity exacted of France by Germany. He took occasion in his argument to extol the benefits of an issue of paper money to meet that crisis. I have not read the history of that time as my honorable friend has read it. I am afraid that if $150,000,000 of these greenbacks are put out, they will never be redeemed; that they will stand to perplex us here and to perplex the country for an indefinite period, which will not be a short period.

But the French Government did not issue on that occasion fiat money—paper money. The Bank of France was authorized by the legislative council to issue, I think, a milliard of francs of paper, made a legal tender. That issue was guaranteed by all the assets of the bank, and in less than three years from the issue of that milliard of francs the whole of them were funded into rentes taken by the French people and the debt was wiped out.

If I could have a guaranty that not only this $150,000,000 of greenbacks, but the $340,000,000 now extant, would be consolidated and funded as the French funded their war debt, I rather think that I might vote for the proposition to issue the additional $150,000,000; but with the experience of thirty-odd years staring us in the face, it is idle to hope that the $150,000,000 would shortly be funded if put out or that the $340,000,000 now in existence will be shortly funded.

I look upon the greenbacks as the source of many of our financial troubles. I look upon their issuance as having debauched, to some extent, the public mind and associated money with the idea of the imperial power of government to create value out of nothing.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, whether my view be right or whether the view of gentlemen who hold that by an imperial edict of this powerful nation we can give value to paper and keep it upon a par with gold, it is not now time to consider. But at least I ask that the prevailing policy of a party pledged to maintain the supremacy and integrity of the gold standard shall be allowed to prevail at this juncture of our affairs.

I do not think, Mr. President, that it is of any avail to discuss this bill in its general features any further than I have. So far as this amendment goes, there are a number of taxes in this bill which in general debate, I suppose, hereafter will be carefully considered, but so far as I am concerned I shall vote, and very cordially vote, against the coinage of the seigniorage. I shall vote against the corporate taxes on gross receipts, and I shall vote against the inheritance tax.

I should like to vote for a further issue of bonds. I believe that the Finance Committee erred when it did not follow the bill passed by the other House, providing for the issue of $500,000,000 of bonds. The proposed issue of bonds is safeguarded in such a manner that no harm could accrue if there were more bonds issued than are necessary for the conduct of the war.

The proviso in the bill limits the proceeds of the bonds to war purposes, and gives the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue the bonds whenever, in his discretion, it becomes necessary for war expenditures. I have full confidence in the President and his Secretary of the Treasury that bonds will not be issued to cover any other expenses than those provided for in the bill. With that safeguard, why not grant at once to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy a sufficient amount of funds to carry on this war to a successful termination?

I am just told that there is another call for 75,000 troops. To fill up the present organization of the Regular Army and the Volunteer Army 190,000 men are required. If you add 75,000 men to that number, you will then have to equip an army of 265,000 men. It will cost at least $1,000 per man to thoroughly arm, equip, and put in the field for one year these 75,000 extra troops; and with the enormous expenses that will be entailed in the transportation of troops from the Pacific coast to Manila, and with the enormous expenses that are necessary to be entailed in the occupation of Cuba, I believe that the estimates of the war expenses are entirely too small.

As my friend from California [Mr. WHITE] suggests to me, we have to establish a stable government in Cuba. That is going to cost a great deal of money. I have never been one of the enthusiasts who have thought that all we had to do was to raise our flag over the Island of Cuba, fire an American gun, and those redoubtable Cuban patriots would flock to our standard immediately and run the Spaniards into the sea. I must confess that I have had some doubts both as to the number and as to the capacity of the great army of Gomez.

It occurs, when we land munitions of war and provisions, after a preconcerted arrangement with the leaders of the insurrection to meet us there and take the arms and provisions, that we do not find the patriots. Perhaps, Mr. President, they have been in such a habit of eluding the Spaniards that they have to keep up that habit, and have eluded our efforts to provide them with arms and supplies. Be that as it may, we are all convinced that this campaign is going to cost a great deal more than any of us heretofore thought.

The rainy season in Cuba has commenced, or is about to commence. Field operations, I am told, are absolutely impossible in the rainy season, both on account of the difficulty of marching and on account of the danger from the different fevers they have there, especially the yellow fever. If we keep the troops here until fall or transport them to Cuba and then have a campaign, if, in the meantime, we do not annihilate the Spanish fleet—which is about as elusive as Gomez's troops—the expenses will swell up to an amount of which we can have no possible conception.

The choice lays between the hazardous and objectionable taxation of corporations, inheritances, and coinage of a loan, and the issuing of bonds under a perfect guaranty that the money will be legally and immediately procured and applied solely for war purposes.

I am not one who wants to fasten entirely upon this generation all the expenditures of this war. These bonds are only provided to run from ten to twenty years. They may be taken up at the expiration of ten years, and are payable at the expiration of twenty years. That is in the space of one generation. It is not a long time to wait. But taxation is a slow business. Before we can derive the amount of taxes imposed by this bill our armies may be in need, our soldiers may suffer, our fleets may want coal. We do not know what exigencies of war may arise.

The idea of saving money by issuing something that is not money in the shape of these greenbacks is an idea that I can not entertain. My feeble intelligence can not grasp it. We could pay as we go if we had a surplus like the Czar of Russia; but our Republic is so regulated that our expenditures and receipts ought to equalize. We do not want a surplus; we are not a despotism; and so, therefore, when war overtakes us we have a depleted Treasury.

The Dingley law itself, Mr. President, is furnishing quite a handsome deficit as the time goes by. The illusory dream entertained by the framers and proponents of that law that at the end of this fiscal year it will catch up, I do not much indulge in. Counting in the amount derived from the sale of the Pacific railroads, it is now $20,000,000 short. In the first eight months of its existence it was about $52,000,000 short. It certainly can not catch up in four months. I do not see how it can be done.

With, therefore, a law framed in peace times failing to raise sufficient revenue, with an expensive war on hand, I ask Senators if it is not wise and prudent at once to provide, after the manner of the financial policy of the party in power, for the necessary sinews, so that the war will not lag and that our armies may not meet with any impediment to that swift and perfect victory which is prayed for by every American patriot?

Mr. MORGAN. I move to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana to the amendment of the committee, and I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment to the amendment be stated from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANTLE in the chair). The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, in line 31, after the word "shareholders," it is proposed to insert:

Limited liability commercial partnerships, or corporations, and companies or corporations of limited liability conducting planting or farming business, or preparing for market products of the soil.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], to lay upon the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY], which has just been read, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. GORMAN. I hope the Senator from Alabama will withdraw that motion until the Senator from Louisiana comes in,

Mr. MORGAN. I will withdraw it.

Mr. CLAY. I will state that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY] has just come in.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the demand for the yeas and nays to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to make a suggestion, if in order. I desire to make a few remarks on the general matter of the special corporation tax, but I prefer to do it the first thing in the morning. The Senator from Alabama, however, has made a motion to lay this particular amendment on the table; and it touches upon a subject which was pretty well discussed—

Mr. MORGAN. This question is not debatable, and I demand a vote.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator can have a vote.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], with whom I am paired, is absent from the Chamber, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON].

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. I do not see him in his seat, and will therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MURPHY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. TURLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. I inquire if he has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. TURLEY. I withhold my vote, in the absence of that Senator. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who is absent, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WELLINGTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HANNA (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] who is not in the Chamber, and therefore I desire to withdraw my vote.

I wish further to say that my colleague [Mr. FORAKER] is absent attending the funeral of his father. He is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

Mr. TILLMAN. I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. I do not know how he would vote, if present, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PASCO. I am paired on this vote with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER].

Mr. MANTLE. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I do not see him in the Chamber, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. HANNA. I desire to transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] stands paired generally with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

The result was announced—yeas 86, nays 10; as follows:

So Mr. McENERY's amendment to the amendment of the committee was laid on the table.

Mr. WHITE obtained the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President—

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from California, I understand, desires to speak to the amendment now pending?

Mr. WHITE. That is correct.

Mr. ALLISON. For reasons best known to himself he prefers to go on to-morrow morning. It is certainly necessary for us, if the bill is to be completed within a reasonable time, to have some understanding about the length of the daily sessions.

I have ascertained, so far as I can, about the number of Senators who desire to speak to the merits of these propositions, and I am satisfied they will not occupy very much more time. I should be willing either that the Senate should adjourn or go into executive session at this hour if we could have some understanding that we will dispose of the bill during the present week. It is known that next Monday is a holiday and that to-morrow at 2 o'clock there is a special assignment in which all Senators are very much interested. I am sure that one faithful day spent upon the bill, possibly with an evening session, will enable us to conclude every provision in it. I ask unanimous consent to have it understood that this bill shall be completed on Saturday before adjournment, fixing no hour or time.

Mr. TELLER. I shall object to that proposition. I told the Senator I would. I do not think we are in a position to agree to that. I desire to say that so far as I am concerned I intend to take a very short time, but there is no necessity for such an agreement now.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I believe the bill can be disposed of by Saturday night, but I believe it can be done much more certainly by not undertaking to have any definite time fixed when the vote is to come. There is no disposition, so far as I know, on either side of the Chamber to delay the consideration of the bill for an hour; we all desire to get along, but there is very strong feeling against being hampered with any definite proposition that we are going to dispose of it at any particular day or at any particular hour.

I believe it can be disposed of before we adjourn Saturday night; but I think the best way to do it is to agree to adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow, come here at 11 and do what we can, and then adjourn until 11 o'clock Friday, and so on. There will be no difficulty in its being done, but I think it is best not to undertake to have an agreement.

Mr. ALLISON. With the assurance of the Senator from Arkansas—

Mr. WHITE. I have the floor.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator permit me? I do not concur with any of the gentlemen who think the bill can be concluded this week. I wish to say for myself that if perchance the amendments which are now pending shall be knocked out of the bill, I have other amendments to propose for them which may open debate. I want to give gentlemen full opportunity to vote for taxation to sustain the Government. If I should find that there is no disposition here to share in the payment of taxes to support the Government in such a way as seems to be equitable and just, I shall move to strike out some of the provisions of the bill in which the country has been put upon a war basis as if it were in a terrible predicament, while other subjects are left in repose. I do not believe we can give sufficient consideration to these subjects and get through by Saturday night.

Neither do I conceive that there is the slightest plausibility in any argument that there is any haste for getting through with the bill. We have the good news, which I certainly hope will prove true, that the Spanish fleet is now cooped up at Santiago de Cuba. If the report should prove to be true, especially if that fleet should be captured, we may dispense with borrowing the few hundred million dollars that are appended to the bill, as the occasion for their use for any legitimate purposes of war expenditure will probably be very much diminished.

Instead of hurrying through the bill, it seems to me, sir, that it ought to be the effort and desire of every member of the Federal Legislature to prevent, if possible, this tremendous public debt and expenditure of public money which is to be laid upon future generations. At least it seems to me that we ought to have every opportunity to put forward fully the views we have upon the various clauses in the bill.

I will state further, Mr. President, while I am upon my feet, that a number of gentlemen, including my neighbors, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], have, instead of discussing the pending amendment to the bill, discussed the bill in its broader features, and that very little time has been occupied by the matter which is understood to be pending before the Senate; and of course if on every amendment of that sort there is to be such enlargement of debate, the time may be extended in which the bill can be got through.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know but that the bill may be disposed of by Saturday night or by the close of the legislative day of Saturday. What I object to is fixing a time and then allowing certain Senators to take the floor and discuss questions connected with the bill and everything else, and at the last moment, when proper amendments are offered, there is no opportunity whatever to explain and discuss them.

I have no disposition myself to delay the bill an hour beyond what is necessary. I am not to be moved into any haste on this bill by any insane clamor we hear from the outside that we are delaying the Government in its efforts to carry on the war. There is nothing in that. The Government will have its money and plenty of it, and it will have it in time, and in ample time. This is a revenue bill of vast interest to the people of the United States, and it ought to be a revenue bill that will be a permanent and not a temporary one, in my judgment. We should take reasonable time for its fair consideration, and get it in shape where it may remain permanently on the statute books, or at least until we have received revenue enough to meet the demand that will certainly come upon us growing out of the war and the conditions that will arise immediately thereafter.

So far as I am concerned, I am willing to come here at 10 o'clock in the morning every morning until the bill is disposed of. If the Senate thinks it is necessary to press matters, I will vote for 10 o'clock as I voted for 11 o'clock yesterday.

Mr. ELKINS. Eleven o'clock is very onerous.

Mr. TELLER. Eleven o'clock or 10 o'clock is not onerous compared with the onerous proposition of disposing of a bill without due consideration. I know that it is popular in some places to suppose that we should, without due consideration, meet the demands for money without any reference to the methods by which the money is to be raised. If we are willing to raise the money in a constitutional manner, we ought at least to have an opportunity to discuss those questions, and, so far as I am concerned, I intend that it shall be done.

Mr. ALLISON. It was no part of my purpose in making these suggestions to prevent full and free discussion upon the bill and every part of it and upon every amendment that may be proposed to it. Senators all about me on both sides of the Chamber, upon such inquiry as I could make, stated that it was possible to finish the bill this week, and now at half past 4 o'clock it is proposed that we shall lay the bill aside. I could not see how it was possible to give full discussion unless we had some understanding as to the hour of meeting and the time for the final disposal of the bill.

I can only say that after to-day, having charge of this bill, I shall endeavor to secure longer sessions of the Senate and longer time for debate upon the various provisions.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Is there any public emergency or occasion why we should attend at extraordinary hours? The Senator is aware that in the mobilization of the troops there are many necessary things that Senators have to attend to outside of the Senate. They are emergent upon them and can not be delayed. If we are to have sessions of extraordinary length, it is almost impossible to attend to them, while if we meet at the usual hour we may keep up with our legislative business and transact outside matters also.

Mr. ALLISON. I know of no public emergency that requires us to pass the bill one day rather than another day, but certainly there is necessity of the passage of the bill at as early a time as it can be passed with the debate and consideration which it ought to have. It seems to me that at this period of the session it is worth while for us to sit here a sufficient number of hours each day to make progress with the bill. We have made very good progress hitherto, I know, but I think we can dispose of these questions in a very few days to the full satisfaction of Senators. As we can have no understanding or arrangement about it, I now move—

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me? I should like to take the floor upon the bill, and I will state that I will proceed when the Senate meets to-morrow and the bill is taken up. I wish to add that so far as I am personally concerned I am anxious to see the matter pressed to a vote as soon as possible, and that I hope and believe it is possible to adjourn Congress within the next two or three weeks.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

SUBURBAN HIGHWAYS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will be remembered that this morning I was about to make a report on the bill (H. R. 10209) to repeal an act of Congress approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," and for other purposes. I ventured to state that this is a matter of very great concern to the people of the District of Columbia. It is a bill which the committee has had under consideration for several months constantly. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration upon the supposition that it will not lead to debate. If it leads to debate, I will ask that it go to the Calendar.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will not press the bill to-night. I prefer that it should go to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

RAILROAD COMPANIES IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8349) granting additional powers to railroad companies created by laws of the United States and operating lines in the Indian Territory.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, in line 3, page 1, after the word "company," to strike out "created by or existing under the laws of the United States and;" and in line 1, page 2, after the word "to," to strike out "paralleling and" and insert "parallel or;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall and may be lawful for any company operating a line of railroad, either wholly or partially, in the Indian Territory to enter into contracts for the use or lease of the railroad and other property of any railroad company whose line may now or hereafter connect with its line upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the respective companies, and to use and operate such road or roads in accordance with the terms of such contract or lease, but subject to the obligations imposed upon the respective companies by their charters or by the laws of the United States or of the State or Territory in which such leased road may be situated: Provided, That the terms of this act shall not apply to parallel or competing lines.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. MASON. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question. Does the bill provide for the purchase of one railroad by another which parallels it?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It does not. If the Secretary will read the first part of the bill, the Senator will see what it does.

Mr. MASON. I do not care for that. I merely want the Senator's statement.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It simply provides that roads operating in the Indian Territory in the same direction that join each other—not parallel roads—may be leased and operated together under one management. There is no such power in the Indian Territory. It exists everywhere else, I think.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House upon the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, Mr. PETTIGREW, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas were appointed.

CAB SERVICE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 189) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to locate a cab service, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. McMILLAN. The joint resolution has already been read. After the word "in," in line 1, page 2, I move that the words "the city of New York" be stricken out and "Washington, D. C." inserted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 1, page 2, it is proposed to strike out "the city of New York" and insert "Washington, D. C.;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to locate on the streets or parts of streets adjoining the stations of any railroad company in the District of Columbia, a stand for cabs, carriages, and other vehicles for the conveyance of passengers to and from the said railroad stations, said service to be established by the said railroad companies. That the rates of charges for the service to be rendered by the said railroad companies shall be fixed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and that at no time shall the schedule exceed the rates now in force in Washington, D. C.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

MARY CAMPBELL.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4086) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent in fee to Mary Campbell, a Nez Perce Indian allottee.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent in fee to Mary Campbell for that portion of the land heretofore allotted to her in the State of Idaho as a Nez Perce Indian which is situated within the limits of what was formerly known as the "Langford claim," and removes all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the land.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PATENTS AND TRADE-MARKS.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 9815) appointing commissioners to revise the statutes relating to patents, trade and other marks, and trade and commercial names.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint three commissioners, to serve without compensation, whose duty it shall be to revise and amend the laws of the United States concerning patents, trade and other marks, and trade or commercial names, which shall be in force at the time such commission shall make its final report, so far as the same relates to matters contained in or affected by the convention for the protection of industrial property concluded at Paris March 20, 1883, the agreements under the convention concluded at Madrid April 14, 1891, and the protocols adopted by the conference held under such convention at Brussels, 1897, and the treaties of the United States, and the laws of other nations relating to patents, trade and other marks, and trade or commercial names.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH R. FINDLEY.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4456) for the relief of Joseph R. Findley.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to revoke the order dismissing Joseph R. Findley from the military service of the United States as captain of Company F, Seventy-sixth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, and to honorably discharge him, to date from the 4th day of October, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 26, 1898, at 11 o'clock a. m.

STATISTICAL ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a report from the Committee on Printing, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That there be printed 12,000 copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1897, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, 3,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate, 6,000 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

There was no objection; and the resolution was agreed to.

Leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WILLIAMS of Pennsylvania, for ten days, on account of sickness in the family.

GRANT OF LAND TO NEW MEXICO.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8226) to make certain grants of land to the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman if this is the unanimous report of the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. LACEY. It is. I think, as the bill is somewhat lengthy, that a few words of explanation will be better, and then the bill may be read at length.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no objection to that. My understanding is that it is a bill all of the committee has reported, and I am willing unanimous consent should be given.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not care whether explanation comes first or after, but I desire to have the bill read before unanimous consent is given for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. I believe the proposition was to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. I will briefly outline the purposes of this bill before having it read by sections for amendment. There are quite a number of amendments recommended by the committee. The Territory of New Mexico is one of the oldest settled of all the Territories of the United States. The city of Santa Fe is perhaps, if not quite, the oldest city in the United States. The country, however, has not been thickly settled; the population is to a considerable extent Mexican, familiar only with the Spanish language, and of necessity the progress of education in the Territory has been slow.

There have been many reasons for keeping this Territory in its present condition and not admitting it as a State into the Union, reasons which will be wholly unnecessary to discuss at this time, but I believe it will be admitted on both sides of the House that there is no immediate probability of its admission into the Union.

Now, this being the case, an injustice is being done to the people, and particularly to the children, of that Territory, by preventing them during so long a period from availing themselves of the privileges of the usual grants of land upon the admission of a Territory into the Union as a sovereign State. There have been recent cases decided by the Private Land Court—a court organized in the Fifty-first Congress to settle the various Spanish land grants which have for a long time clouded that Territory and Arizona—cases in which it has been held that land which has heretofore been claimed under Spanish grants are now subject to the general power of the Congress of the United States as a part of the public domain. These lands, however, unless selections are made from them, will speedily be culled until probably by the time the Territory shall have been admitted into the Union there will be nothing left for the new State but the desert land from which to make selections.

The gentleman from New Mexico, the Delegate from that Territory [Mr. FERGUSON], introduced this bill, taking the enabling act of the Territory of Utah as his guide, making a number of grants, the usual land grants, and introduced a bill granting immediately to that Territory substantially the same amount of land that has been given to the State of Utah. In considering the matter in the Committee on Public Lands it was thought that this would involve a very close discussion as to the amount and character of the land, and as to the propriety of an apportionment by Congress, and it was suggested to the Delegate from New Mexico that it would perhaps be better to take his bill and scale it down and give to the Territory at present about one-half as much land as Utah has received, and reserve for the final admission of the Territory a grant of such additional amount as would bring it up to the amount allowed a new State, and something like in value what its sister States have heretofore received.

There is no State that is exactly like New Mexico. The State of Utah comes nearer to it as to the character and capabilities of the land, and we have taken the grants to that Territory as the basis, and have scaled the amount of the land to about one-half what was granted to that State. It is thought that that ought to be satisfactory as a solution of the question at this time, and will enable the new Territory to make a selection of a considerable portion of the land that will ultimately be of value.

Mr. DOKERY. What number of acres does the act grant to the Territory of New Mexico by this bill?

Mr. LACEY. The grant is made in different forms. The State of Utah obtained four sections for school purposes.

In most of the States—in fact, all of them lying east of the Mississippi—the grant was made of one section in each township for school purposes. West of the Mississippi and the Missouri the grant has usually been of two sections out of each township. But in Utah, the land being poor—largely arid—the grant has been increased to four sections in each township, it being thought that in consideration of the arid land of that region four sections would not be any more valuable than two sections somewhat farther east, or one section still farther east—east of the Mississippi River.

Mr. HARTMAN. Does this grant, which operates as a sort of grant preliminary to statehood, preclude the filling out of the full grant to New Mexico when it shall become a State?

Mr. LACEY. The committee in cutting the grant down to one-half, as I have already explained, inserted also a provision—

That this act is intended only as a partial grant of the lands to which said Territory may be entitled upon its admission into the Union as a State, reserving the question as to the total amount of lands to be granted to said Territory until the admission of said Territory as a State shall be determined on by Congress.

Mr. HARTMAN. That is satisfactory.

Mr. LACEY. That provision would enable Congress at some future time to make the total quantity of land what might be considered right. If the grant to Utah should be considered too large, the quantity could be scaled down; if it should be concluded that the grant in the case of Utah was substantially what the Territory of New Mexico ought to have, that quantity could be determined upon; or, if deemed just, a still larger grant could be made.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. LACEY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KING. I desire to inquire whether this is a grant in present, transferring the title absolutely to the control of the Territory, so that it may be appropriated by the legislature for school purposes—whether or not the Territory by its legislature will be able to exercise proper control over this land, so as to alienate it, rent it, or do anything that a sovereign power may do with respect to territory under its control?

Mr. LACEY. The provision about which the gentleman inquires is embraced in the substitute for section 10. As proposed in the original bill, that section provided—

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior shall continue to dispose of said lands, except as herein otherwise provided, according to the general land laws of the United States, and shall preserve in separate funds the proceeds of the sale of said lands, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, for the use of the Territory of New Mexico, as such proceeds may from time to time be appropriated by the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico for the purpose indicated in each respective grant of land made herein.

The amendment proposed by the committee is as follows:

That the lands reserved for university purposes, including all saline lands, and sections 16 and 36 reserved for public schools, may be leased under such laws and regulations as may be hereafter prescribed by the legislative assembly of said Territory; but until the meeting of the next legislature of said Territory the governor, secretary of the Territory, and the solicitor-general shall constitute a board for the leasing of said lands; and all necessary expenses and costs incurred in the leasing, management, and protection of said lands and leases may be paid out of the proceeds derived from such leases. And it shall be unlawful to cut, remove, or appropriate in any way any timber growing upon the lands leased under the provisions of this act, and not more than one section of land shall be leased to any one person, corporation, or association of persons, and no lease shall be made for a longer period than five years, and all leases shall terminate on the admission of said Territory as a State; and all money received on account of such leases in excess of actual expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the execution thereof shall be placed to the credit of separate funds for the use of said institutions, and shall be paid out only as directed by the legislative assembly of said Territory, and for the purposes indicated herein. The remainder of the lands granted by this act, except those lands which may be leased only as above provided, may be sold under such laws and regulations as may be hereafter prescribed by the legislative assembly of said Territory.

It will be observed that the provision of the amendment gives to the Territory the power to lease and also the power subsequently to sell—and all such necessary costs and expenses as may be incurred in the management, protection, and sale of said lands may be paid out of the proceeds derived from such sales; and not more than one-quarter section of land shall be sold to any one person, corporation, or association of persons, and no sale of said lands or any portion thereof shall be made for less than $1.25 per acre; and all money received on account of such sales, after deducting the actual expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the execution thereof, shall be placed to the credit of separate funds created for the respective purposes named in this act, etc.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me one question?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. If I understand correctly, this bill is designed to give to the Territory of New Mexico a portion of the lands that would be given to it, according to the custom in such cases, if it were admitted as a State?

Mr. LACEY. Approximately about one-half.

Mr. McMILLIN. And this action is only anticipating to that extent the statehood of New Mexico?

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. McMILLIN. Now, does not the gentleman think that the Territory of New Mexico has sufficient area to justify its admission as a State?

Mr. LACEY. I decline to discuss that proposition. I do not want to embarrass my friend from New Mexico by introducing the question of statehood at this time. I have very decided views upon that question; and I have no doubt my friend from Tennessee has equally decided views upon it. I do not care to go into that question at this time. It is enough to say that there is no present probability of the admission of that Territory into the Union during the present Congress.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then, if the gentleman declines to answer my question, I trust he will allow me a moment to make this suggestion: He has said there is no present prospect of the admission of that Territory as a State. Now, it has all the area necessary for admission as a State; it has and has had for years all the population necessary to admit it as a State. It ought to be admitted as a State—

Mr. LACEY. I think not.

Mr. McMILLIN. And I simply wanted to say that we do great injustice to that Territory and to ourselves by not admitting it as a State.

The effect of this, I fear, will be to postpone its admission as a State. I do not believe we ought to rob them of that to which they are entitled because we refuse to do them one justice; and as a representative of another portion of the Union, I want to raise my voice to-day in favor of the admission of both that Territory and Arizona as States, and I do not hesitate to say also that I am perfectly satisfied that but for political considerations they would have been admitted long ago and that if they were not Democratic they would be admitted now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. I hope my friend from Tennessee feels better, but at the same time—

Mr. McMILLIN. I should feel very much better if you would do justice to these people instead of having complaints made necessary.

Mr. LACEY. We are doing absolute justice to them. I am reporting a bill from the Committee on Public Lands, not from the Committee on Territories. We have no right to report a bill for the admission of that Territory into the Union. I say frankly that I do not think that Territory ought to be admitted into the Union at this time.

Mr. McMILLIN. What objection can there possibly be to it?

Mr. LACEY. I do not propose to go into a political discussion, but simply give my views upon it.

Mr. McMILLIN. If it is right to give an opinion it is not wrong to give a reason for it.

Mr. LACEY. Very well. The gentleman often gives opinions and seldom gives good reasons, and I will not give any reasons for the nonadmission of that Territory into the Union at this time.

Now, I should like to yield to my friend from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSON], the Delegate from that Territory, such time as he may desire to explain this bill.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, the proposition of this bill is that the Government shall grant to the Territory of New Mexico of the unappropriated public lands within the said Territory for its use during the remainder of its Territorial condition, for its public schools and other public institutions, a portion of the lands which would have been granted to the said Territory if it had been admitted to the Union during this term of Congress. I need not call the attention of the House to the fact that every new State receives from the Government, on its admission, a large donation of public lands within its borders for the use of its public schools and other public institutions.

New Mexico, having been denied admission by this Congress, now asks, and it is proposed in this bill to grant to her, not all the land she would have received if admitted at this time, but only a portion thereof. The necessity for this legislation at the present time arises partly out of the arid condition of a large majority of the public lands of New Mexico and partly out of the operations of the Court of Private Land Claims, which has been passing upon Spanish and Mexican grants in that Territory since 1891.

If New Mexico had been admitted to Statehood at the time this land court was created, she would doubtless have received in the number of acres the usual quota given to new States upon admission. She would have found no lands of value to select from, because she has been retained so long in a Territorial condition, and because during this time all of the lands subject to irrigation, and therefore all the lands of any value, had been taken up by the entry of private individuals under the general land laws of the Government, and nothing remained at that time, practically, except what was locked up in the large number of Spanish and Mexican grants and what was arid and hardly worthy for private entry. It will be remembered that immediately upon the creation of the Territory Congress enacted that all Mexican and Spanish grants, as claimed, without reference to validity or invalidity, should be reserved from public entry.

All lands in New Mexico not so reserved had been culled over by private entries, above described, for about fifty years, during our Territorial condition, leaving only arid lands. The Land Court, however, has lately restored to the public domain many hundreds of thousands of acres of land which had previously been claimed under the Spanish and Mexican grants. These lands have lately been restored to the public domain, and they are quite valuable and will certainly rapidly be taken up by private entry under the general land laws of the Government. The necessity as well as the justice of our claim will therefore be at once recognized.

Though denied statehood, if we are permitted now, nevertheless, to select the lands we would have been enabled to select had we been admitted by this Congress, we can get lands of value from the land lately restored to the public domain; while if we are denied this right, which it is proposed in this bill to give us, and are kept even a few years longer in a Territorial condition, then when we may be admitted in the future, all the good lands will be gone by the operation of the general land laws of the Government and private entries of them under such general laws. It is to save New Mexico from this deplorable and undeniable injustice that this bill at the present time is a positive necessity.

It is, moreover, a just bill. Both Oklahoma and Arizona are permitted to lease the school lands within their borders, and I am informed by the ex-Delegate from Oklahoma that that Territory realizes from such lands, at the present time, about $100,000 a year. Arizona gets some benefit from the same source; I do not know exactly how much. New Mexico is not even permitted to lease the public sections set aside under the general law, and she has positively never received a dollar of aid for her educational system from the General Government. The States lately created in the Northwest have received munificent donations of land, and for eight or ten years have had their public institutions supported by the General Government.

New Mexico can challenge comparison with any of them as to the excellence of her public-school system, which has been built up by voluntary taxation of her own citizens. We have indeed a magnificent public-school system in New Mexico. The justice of this bill, therefore, especially since one of the reasons that has been urged for rejecting our claim to statehood is that we are ignorant, can surely not be denied by anyone. If we are too ignorant for statehood, help us to become educated sufficiently, because you surely can not contemplate keeping us forever in a Territorial condition by refusing us the means of overcoming the objection of ignorance.

Now, the Public Lands Committee have gone exhaustively through this bill as to its details. The general purport of it has been very clearly and ably explained by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, the honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], and I should like to say for him and for the other members of the Public Lands Committee that for conscientiousness and laborious investigation of this question they have shown themselves to appreciate our condition and to be above anything like partisan considerations in dealing with it.

Now, there is one other point that I should like to make, and that is this: We are in the midst of a war. Partisanship has been set aside. The people of New Mexico have had the right to feel that they have been badly treated by the Congress of the United States in being so long denied admission to the Union. Yet they are not embittered. They come to you now asking for simple justice, relying on the belief that their argument is strong enough to prevail with just men. They are not embittered; and when the President in his call for 125,000 volunteers allotted to New Mexico four troops of cowboy cavalry to represent that Territory's quota, in a shorter time than the majority of the States responded New Mexico responded with a full quota, and they are now at San Antonio or at New Orleans or on the way to Cuba. They are cowboys who are crack shots, every one of them, who were almost born in the saddle, and who will be as capable to stand the hardships of army life and as brave in battle and as loyal to this Government as any troops that will be sent. [Applause.]

I will not at this time argue the question of the injustice of denying statehood to New Mexico. I will not inquire, as my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] has done, into the reasons why we are excluded. I put all that aside and ask for the passage of this measure without regard to that. I will not go into the reasons why we should be admitted into statehood. They are foreign to this question; but I do state to you that in these war times of universal enthusiasm and patriotism, in spite of the fact that that Territory has been so badly treated, it is as loyal and as enthusiastic and as ready to fight as any people in these United States, and while the quota of that Territory has been filled and her four troops of cavalry are now ready to embark for Cuba, and may be there within a week, I say to you that it is within my knowledge that if ten times that number had been called for, judging from the letters that I get personally, judging from the reports in the press, judging from all the evidence attainable, they would have been forthcoming just as promptly. [Applause.]

Now, it is not necessary for me to elaborate. The chairman of the committee has explained the general purport of the bill, and I want to say to everyone who is listening to me that he and his committee, as to the details of the bill, have gone through it exhaustively, and you surely can trust them.

I believe the chairman of the committee [Mr. LACEY] has certain amendments to propose, all of which I am willing to accept.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty-seven minutes.

Mr. LACEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, I desire to say a few words concerning this measure.

New Mexico has been knocking at the door of the Union for admission for fifty years. Whether that admission has been denied rightly or wrongly has nothing to do with this measure. I myself believe that it ought to have been admitted long ago, but others may differ upon that question. I appreciate the fact that at this time we have no right to propose an amendment to this bill to admit the Territory of New Mexico, and consequently that matter is not germane and can not be considered; but I want to call your attention to the fact that that Territory has been trying to get into the Union for a long time, in order to show that the denial of that right to be admitted into the Union works a hardship upon its school interests. Each State on being admitted into the Union is entitled to sections 16 and 36 out of every township, and is entitled under the general law of the United States to a certain other number of acres for university purposes, for mining-school purposes, and for other purposes. Since the Territory of New Mexico under the present law is denied admission into the Union, it has no right to select any of the lands for these purposes.

The result is that individuals have selected the best lands in New Mexico. Nearly all the good lands up to a year ago in New Mexico were taken. The reason this measure ought to be passed immediately is that the Supreme Court has decided recently that certain Mexican land grants situated in the Territory of New Mexico, and which embrace some of the best lands in New Mexico, were not valid, and thus opened those lands to entry. Now, if this bill pass, and the Territory of New Mexico is permitted to select lands for school purposes, it will select these very rich lands which have been considered private lands.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that they do not belong to the individuals under Mexican land grants. If the Territory of New Mexico is not permitted to take lands at the present time, it will never be possible for that Territory to obtain lands that are valuable for their school purposes. The result of the Territory being allowed to select these lands will be that upon their sale a large quantity of money will go into the treasury of New Mexico for the purpose of educating the children of that Territory. On that account, it seems to me, whether admitted next year or ten years from now as a State, this law ought to pass now. If those lands are permitted to be taken up by private individuals, and if the Territory is not granted permission to select lands for school purposes until it is admitted into the Union, there will be no good lands left for this purpose.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. When you compare the population and industrial condition of that Territory with those formerly admitted as States, does it not compare favorably?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It compares very favorably. New Mexico has been entitled to statehood for thirty years. There is no doubt about that; but that is not the question here. I would like to see it admitted as a State. I have always believed that a liberal policy ought to be pursued as to the admission of Territories. But the question here is, Shall we give these lands to the Territory for school purposes, so that it may be able to build up a school fund for the education of the children therein, or shall we delay this grant until it acquires statehood, when all the good lands will have been taken up, and nothing will be left but desert lands that are of no value? The proceeds from the sale of desert lands will be small, indeed, to go into the school funds of New Mexico for the education of its children. That is all I have to say on the matter, and I hope the bill will pass unanimously. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. LACEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I was on the subcommittee that went over this bill, the principle of which is to do substantial justice to the Territory of New Mexico. It will not be necessary, in order that this bill may be properly explained, to discuss whether or not it is proper at this time to admit New Mexico as a State. We each have our individual opinions in regard to that matter. But we do feel that in order that that Territory may have absolute justice it is necessary that a bill of this character should pass at this time. For reasons that have been recounted by gentlemen who have already spoken on this question, we know that lands valuable in their character have by a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States been thrown open for settlement under the land laws of the United States.

Now, if an act of this character is not passed, it is certain that these lands will be taken up by private individuals, and when New Mexico is admitted as a State, whether it be five or ten years from now, as has been well said by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], there will be nothing but husks, comparatively speaking, for the support of the schools in New Mexico. One of the reasons urged why New Mexico should not be admitted as a State has been that the population was not sufficiently educated. Now, then, gentlemen, if there is anything in that argument, it is our duty, when we come to deal with this question, to give to those people such provisions as are within our right, and to do so in such a manner as will enable them to build up a common-school system that will be a credit to the Union when New Mexico is admitted as a State.

I think this bill is absolutely just and right, and this is a privilege that we should grant to New Mexico at this time. I believe that a delay in the passage of a bill of this character will work substantial injury to that Territory; and I do not believe the American Congress, if they fully understood all the relationships of this bill to the people of New Mexico, would hesitate for one moment to pass it. It is a good bill, in my opinion. We have given it careful consideration, and I believe this House ought to pass it at once.

Mr. LACEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, this bill ought unquestionably to be passed for New Mexico. I take the floor only for the purpose of suggesting to the House that it does not go far enough. I have introduced no similar bill for Arizona, because the condition there, as it now exists, is that for school purposes we have no such lands to lay our hands on. They probably never will have lands that will be of much value when the Territory is admitted to statehood, it matters not whether it be by this Congress or a subsequent Congress. The lands, which are principally arid, ought to be directly donated to the Territory for school and administrative purposes.

Mr. ELLIS. If the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question. If some bill like this is not passed soon, will not New Mexico be in the same condition?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. New Mexico will unquestionably be in the condition of Arizona if this land is not given to it for that purpose. Now, all the lands that can be taken up and cheaply irrigated are already held in New Mexico. As this land, by a decision of the Supreme Court, has been thrown open to settlement under the land laws of the United States, New Mexico ought to have the right to select it for school purposes; and if it is not given that privilege, the land will be taken up by private individuals. Congress ought to make a donation of the arid lands in the States and Territories which will enable them to put them to profitable use. The Government will never go to the expense of providing a system of irrigation for these lands; and if it does not intend to do so, they will never be irrigated.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the gentleman the character of this land. I understand it is proposed to grant about a million acres. Is it agricultural or arid?

Mr. LACEY. It is both. It is all arid. New Mexico is an arid State. They lack water there and education. We are trying to furnish them land with which to aid in education. The land, some of it, is easily irrigated. Some of it recently held as public land may be easily irrigated and is of value.

Mr. DOCKERY. Has the gentleman considered the propriety of turning the arid lands over to the State and letting them wrestle with the problem of irrigation?

Mr. LACEY. That is one of the problems that has come up every year for twenty-five years. It is a suggestion that was made in the Carey Act. It was proposed there to give these gentlemen that want all the arid land, that want everything that is dry, it was proposed to give them a million acres in each State to try the experiment of State irrigation. Some features of it, I think, passed through the Committee on Appropriations. Under the Carey Act each arid State can take a million acres and irrigate it and own it. I believe no State has undertaken it except the State of Wyoming, the State in which Senator Carey resided. They have only taken a portion of it; they have not complied with the Carey Act even in that State. In other words, the well-intended Carey Act has practically proved a failure. We have upon the Calendar a bill introduced by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] amendatory of the Carey Act, providing a different method of allowing each State to take a million acres and attempting to irrigate it. Whether that will prove a failure I do not know. My friend from Colorado is as full of hope as Senator Carey was.

Great opposition is developed to taking all the arid land. There is a journal published in San Francisco—possibly my friend gets it, for it is mailed to various members of the House—in which the main object of the editor is to satisfy the public that the State ought not to have the arid land, that it is too great a problem for the State, that the water to irrigate these lands must come from without the State—in Utah it must come from Idaho or Wyoming largely—and it is argued that this is a question beyond the power of the State and can not be handled by a single State.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the gentleman will yield to me a moment, I desire to say that the people who advocate that do so upon the supposition that the National Government will appropriate money for the purpose of building canals and reservoirs, etc., for irrigation. My idea is that that is impracticable; that it is impracticable to ask that, and I think the land ought to be ceded to the State.

Mr. LACEY. I am in favor of my friend's bill, the bill to take the place of the Carey Act. It is an experiment and I do not have great hopes of it, for the reasons that I have suggested, that the water question is not limited to any single State. You must reach out beyond the borders of the State in order to have reservations for supplies of water. When you grant the State all the arid lands within its borders the State has, in the irrigation of those lands, something it can not handle, something which is now under the control of Congress, an interstate question which Congress is capable of controlling and legislating upon. The time will come when some general and comprehensive system of irrigation will be provided by national legislation. Not by any wild Coxey scheme of issuing bonds and greenbacks and turning somebody out to dig irrigating ditches, but by a careful, well-considered system of irrigation adapted to each locality. You can not draw a bill for one State that will fit another State, because the situations are so different. We have in this bill a grant of 500,000 acres to New Mexico for irrigation purposes, to be used in the construction of reservoirs, and in the line which has been suggested by my friend from Missouri.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee a question for information. Outside of the Indian reservations, about how many acres of agricultural land yet belong to the public domain?

Mr. LACEY. I have seen the statement made by E. V. Smalley, and I believe he is right about it. He says if you take a 20-acre field and start in at one side and run a furrow right straight through it, the irrigable land compared to the nonirrigable land in the whole Union is in the same proportion as the furrow to the 20-acre field. In other words, the amount that can actually be irrigated is remarkably small as compared with the vast tract in which the nonirrigable land is located.

But only incidentally does the irrigation question arise in the present bill. It arises to the extent of half a million acres to be used for irrigation purposes.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman did not quite catch my question. Aside from the Indian reservations, how many acres of agricultural land now belong to the public domain suitable for agriculture without irrigation?

Mr. LACEY. That is a very difficult question, because the boundary of the land not requiring irrigation is somewhat uncertain. The hundredth parallel of latitude has been selected as a kind of arbitrary dead line, beyond which a settler takes his life in his hands if he attempts to farm without irrigation. That line, however, is not clearly defined. In some parts of the country you can go farther west with safety. In other parts you can not go quite that far. But in a general way somewhere near that line is the boundary between the land that receives usually rainfall enough for the raising of crops and the land that can only raise crops successfully by means of irrigation. The number of acres has not been definitely ascertained by the authorities. Surveys, however, have been in progress for several years, with which surveys the gentleman from Missouri is fully familiar, because the Appropriations Committee has annually set apart funds for the purpose. I doubt not in a few years that question can be answered accurately, or with sufficient accuracy, by the Geological Survey.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if no one else desires to discuss this bill—and the opinion seems to be unanimously in its favor—I ask that the general debate be closed and that the bill be read by sections for amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that general debate be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the bill by sections for amendment under the five-minute rule, as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section of the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections Nos. 2, 18, 22, and 36 in every township of the Territory of New Mexico, and where such sections, or any parts thereof, have been sold or otherwise disposed of, by or under the authority of any act of Congress, other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one-quarter section, and as contiguous as may be to the section in lieu of which the same is taken, are hereby granted to said Territory for the support of common schools, such indemnity lands to be selected within said Territory in such manner as is hereinafter provided: Provided, That the second, sixteenth, thirty-second, and thirty-sixth sections embraced in permanent reservations for national purposes shall not, at any time, be subject to the grants nor to the indemnity provisions of this act, nor shall any lands embraced in Indian, military, or other reservations of any character be subject to the grants or to the indemnity provisions of this act until the reservation shall have been extinguished and such lands be restored to and become a part of the public domain.

That in addition to the above, 150,000 acres of land, to be selected and located as hereinafter provided, together with all saline lands in said Territory, are hereby granted to the said Territory for the use of said university, and 200,000 acres, to be in like manner selected, for the use of an agricultural college. The amendment reported by the committee was read and agreed to, as follows:

Strike out the whole of section 10 and insert as section 10 the following:

"SEC. 10. That the lands reserved for university purposes, including all line lands and sections 16 and 36, reserved for public schools, may be leased under such laws and regulations as may be hereafter prescribed by the legislative assembly of said Territory; but until the meeting of the next legislature of said Territory the governor, secretary of the Territory, and the solicitor-general shall constitute a board for the leasing of said lands; and all necessary expenses and costs incurred in the leasing, management, and protection of said lands and leases may be paid out of the proceeds derived from such leases. And it shall be unlawful to cut, remove, or appropriate in any way any timber growing upon the lands leased under the provisions of this act, and not more than one section of land shall be leased to any one person, corporation, or association of persons, and no lease shall be made for a longer period than five years, and all leases shall terminate on the admission of said Territory as a State; and all money received on account of such leases in excess of actual expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the execution thereof shall be placed to the credit of separate funds for the use of said institutions and shall be paid out only as directed by the legislative assembly of said Territory and for the purposes indicated herein. The remainder of the lands granted by this act, except those lands which may be leased only as above provided, may be sold under such laws and regulations as may be hereafter prescribed by the legislative assembly of said Territory, and all such necessary costs and expenses as may be incurred in the management, protection, and sale of said lands may be paid out of the proceeds derived from such sales, and not more than one-quarter section of land shall be sold to any one person, corporation, or association of persons, and no sale of said lands or any portion thereof shall be made for less than $1.25 per acre, and all money received on account of such sales, after deducting the actual expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the execution thereof, shall be placed to the credit of separate funds created for the respective purposes named in this act, and shall be used only as the legislative assembly of said Territory may direct, and only for the use of the institutions or purposes for which the respective grants of lands are made: Provided, That such legislative assembly may provide for leasing all or any part of the lands granted in this act on the same terms and under the same limitations prescribed above as to the lands that may be leased only."

Mr. LACEY. I move to amend by inserting at the end of section 10 the following:

After the word "only," line 23, page 8, insert: "but all leases made under the provisions of this act shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and all investments made or securities purchased with the proceeds of sales or leases of lands provided for by this act shall be subject to like approval by the Secretary of the Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

The eleventh and twelfth sections were read, as follows:

SEC. 11. That there is hereby appropriated from the unexpended funds in the Treasury of the United States $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of paying the expenses of the selection and segregation of said respective bodies of land, including such compensation to said commission as the Secretary of the Interior may deem proper.

SEC. 12. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act, whether passed by the legislative assembly of said Territory or by Congress, are hereby repealed.

Mr. TALBERT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, whether it is not possible that some general statute be enacted covering all these public-land questions, so as to obviate the necessity of so many special laws?

Mr. LACEY. So far as practicable the committee always brings in general bills on these subjects. But the situations in different cases are so various that it is impossible always to do so. For instance, the grant of land now made to the Territory of New Mexico is larger than the grant made to the State of Iowa. The State of Iowa receives only one section out of every thirty-six, while New Mexico receives two sections out of thirty-six, and this is only about one-half of what the Territory will ultimately be entitled to. As the situations change the legislation must of necessity change.

Mr. TALBERT. I suppose the admission of these Territories as States causes these complications.

Mr. LACEY. In this case it is the nonadmission of the Territory that has given rise to the necessity of this partial legislation to meet the peculiar circumstances that have arisen. Land is now available that will not be available unless this bill passes at this time. Hence we bring in a bill giving the Territory a portion of the land prior to admission to the Union, although ordinarily, and I think in every instance heretofore, the land has only been granted in the enabling act upon admission of a State into the Union. I call for a vote on the third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. Res. 257. Joint resolution providing for the organization and enrollment of the United States auxiliary naval force.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 4645. An act to provide an American register for the steamship Zealandia; and

S. R. 107. Joint resolution ratifying and confirming certain temporary appointments of officers of the Navy.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR ISHAM G. HARRIS.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have a special order made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, June 11, 1898, be set apart for paying tribute to the memory of Hon. ISHAM G. HARRIS, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR JAMES Z. GEORGE.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. JAMES Z. GEORGE, late a Senator from the State of Mississippi.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who desire to do so may print in the RECORD eulogies upon the late Senator GEORGE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that gentlemen may print their eulogies in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, Senator GEORGE had no more unselfish friend than myself. During my long acquaintance with him I never allowed an opportunity for serving him to go by unavailing of, and it so happened that more than one such opportunity arose. He many times most cordially acknowledged the assistance I had given him and thanked me for it. I never burdened him with my affairs and never called upon him to aid me in meeting and overcoming the difficulties which have at times beset me, as they do indeed every man in public life.

Hence what I shall say of him springs from a judgment unbiased except so far as it may insensibly be affected by sentiments of friendship. I first met him in 1870, while attending a term of the circuit court of Sunflower County, which was then held at the town of McNutt. His home at that time, as it had been for many years before, was in the town of Carrollton, the county seat of Carroll County. Shortly after my first meeting with him—in 1878, I think—he removed to Jackson, the capital of the State, in order that he might extend the sphere of his professional work. He formed a partnership with Hon. Wiley P. Harris, one of the most famous lawyers of the South, for whom I always entertained great affection and the highest possible admiration, and who honored me with cordial and outspoken friendship. It is my deliberate judgment that the law firm of Harris & George was as able as any that ever existed in any age or any country.

My acquaintance with both of its members was intimate, my observation of their methods and struggles was almost constant, and I unhesitatingly affirm that in my opinion they had both reached the very summit of professional excellence and power. In the trial of causes Senator GEORGE was resolute and aggressive from start to finish. When negotiations for settlement out of court had ceased and the arbitrament of the law had been appealed to, he did not wait for his opponent to strike the first blow, but moved upon him at once with all the enginery which industry, courage, learning, and skill could invent, and with a determination and aggressiveness that may well be called fierce. Indeed, he was never a carpet knight. He believed in the efficacy of hard blows, and when the struggle was on, whether in the fields of politics or of law, he rained them down upon his opponents with all the swiftness and vigor that his strong arm could command.

No client ever had reason to complain that his cause had suffered from neglect or indifference. He devoted to every cause intrusted to him, whether great or small, all the skill and ability and force he possessed. This was not merely because he felt that his duty to his clients exacted this of him, but because over and above all other considerations he loved the strife and combat of the court room. He knew his own power as a legal gladiator, and the exercise of it, I verily believe, was the greatest pleasure he ever experienced. True fighter as he was, he never complained of the blows that his own aggression provoked, but received or parried them as best he could, passed them by when the struggle was over as among its necessary incidents, and at once armed himself for the next encounter.

He often wrested victory from the jaws of defeat when a less able and skillful advocate would have given up the cause as lost. Indeed, this was a not uncommon incident in his career, for his ambition to win was so unbounded that it was often said of him that he did not know when he was defeated; and so, struggling on when others would have surrendered, it oftentimes chanced that unforeseen opportunity would offer whereby he could turn disaster into triumph. Even when in the nisi prius courts the verdict had gone against him, or when in the appellate courts he had encountered an adverse judgment, he rarely abandoned the struggle. Motions for new trials, appeals, and applications for rehearing were everyday occurrences in his practice, and through them he often recovered the ground he had lost.

But when he had gained his cause his fierceness and aggressiveness were laid aside; and he always treated his defeated opponent with the greatest courtesy and kindness. And, better than this, he always advised his victorious client to make terms with his adversary, and the pound of flesh, except in cases of wrongdoing and fraud, was rarely ever exacted. It was but natural that such a lawyer should find his hands full, and in his case his hands were full to overflowing. He was not a specialist. He frequented courts of law, of equity, of admiralty, and of bankruptcy alike, and he was at home in all of them.

His capacity for work, and by this I mean work of the highest class, intellectually and otherwise, was simply prodigious. And the facility with which he could turn from one character of work to another wholly different was one of his most notable gifts. Indeed, his desire for work was quite equal to his capacity, and he simply could not be idle. Except in his latter days, when the condition of his eyes forbade his using them at night, I do not remember a time when I visited him, whether at his law office, his committee room, or his home, without finding him deeply absorbed in work.

Amidst the labors which I have but poorly described, and which were greater than most men could bear, he found time to officially report ten volumes of the opinions of the appellate court of his State, and to prepare and publish a digest of more than forty volumes of such opinions. This digest is a model in all respects and is so absolutely accurate that no lawyer familiar with it ever thinks of turning to the opinions themselves to verify his statement as to what was decided by them. He also found time to invest with care and prudence his professional earnings and to manage with marked success the large landed estates which grew out of them.

In 1879 he was appointed to the supreme bench of Mississippi, and became its chief justice. His opinions are marvels of learning, and bear upon their face the same tokens of infinite research and industry which had characterized his career as an advocate. The only criticism I have ever heard of them is that they are too long. They are long because he was anxious to demonstrate to the legal profession the soundness of his findings, and, with that purpose, he sometimes, perhaps, reviewed with unnecessary detail the facts and arguments laid before the court. If he committed a fault in this respect, it was on the right side, for litigants and their counsel, though losing as the result of his opinions, had at least the satisfaction of knowing that he had overlooked none of their contentions, but had given all of them careful and painstaking investigation.

I will now pass to some consideration of his political career. At the meeting of the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, called to take suitable action upon the death of Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar, late an associate justice of that court, in discussing his life and services, I said:

The great conflict between the States had been far-reaching in its results. His fortunes had been cast with and had gone down with the States of the South. By the judgment of war they had never ceased to be States of the Union; whereas, by ordinance of the civic authorities, they were denied the rights belonging to States of the Union. This condition, paradoxical as it may seem, was not unexpected and perhaps could not have been avoided.

However this may be, there resulted an upheaval so tremendous and of such duration that for long there appeared no hope of surcease. There was first laid upon the South the heavy hand of military authority. That hand, carefully gloved though it may be, is always rude. When that at last was uplifted and counterfeit civil authority began, all government ceased. In its place came plunder, oppression, extortion, confusion—and all in the name of law.

It seemed that our brothers of the North, though bred of the same flesh and bone, could not see nor hear the cruelty and wickedness that was paralyzing the South. Consternation and despair abode with us by day and by night. But the dawn was soon to break.

The great statesman whose memory this assemblage would honor had been dreaming. With that profound insight and unerring sagacity for which he was so preeminent, he perceived (what few of us in the South did) that local quarrel and contention with those who had been installed in the high places in our midst could beget no lasting respite or relief. He foresaw that without the moral support of the strong and triumphant North those masquerades would vanish without a struggle. The field of action must be transferred to the halls of the nation's council. While the situation must be fearlessly unveiled, so that the whole world might behold its shameful nakedness and the honest judgment of the North be thus challenged, yet much more than this needed to be done.

The heart of the nation must be touched. The people of the contending sections must be brought together and made to understand each other. By such means alone could those whom he so dearly loved be rescued, and friendship and fraternalism reenthroned. To this great work the balance of his life may truly be said to have been consecrated. He sought and obtained a seat in the House of Representatives, and from that time, it may be justly affirmed, the real work of reconstruction began. How well he performed that lofty and self-imposed mission need not be recited here for it is a part of the country's history. Beginning with his exquisite yet startling and unexpected eulogy upon Charles Sumner, which with electric swiftness reached and thrilled the hearts of all men, his utterances and actions have been a constant and eloquent plea for a higher, nobler, and more patriotic national life. His labors in this direction were rewarded by the richest fruition.

Largely through the devoted efforts of Mr. Lamar, mentioned by me in the foregoing remarks, the horrors which constituted the main feature of the reconstruction governments in the Southern States had come to be fairly well known throughout the North. The Congressional elections of 1874 gave abundant evidence of this. General Grant, then President, who fully appreciated the existing conditions, had publicly stated that the North had become weary of the autumnal outbreaks in the South, which regularly came for the purpose of enlisting Federal support in behalf of the reconstruction governments.

In 1875 there was to be in Mississippi a general election of members of the legislature, and it seemed that a united and well-directed effort might rid the State of the insufferable incubus which was strangling the life out of it, restore good government, and make it possible for peace and prosperity once more to cross its stricken borders. To achieve this great end it was not only necessary that the people should be aroused to supreme effort, but that they should so restrain their just resentment and indignation as not to overstep legal bounds, and thereby provoke Federal interference, which had theretofore on more than one occasion been a conspicuous factor in Southern politics. Senator GEORGE, then a private citizen, was chosen to lead this uprising, and to that end was made chairman of the Democratic State executive committee.

For months he laid aside his private business and gave all of his time and talents, and freely of his money, to the control and direction of this movement. With a patience that knew no bounds, a discretion that was the marvel of his friends, a diplomacy which was beyond exhaustion, and a courage and grim determination that inspired all who came in contact with him, he organized his forces, and led them to a victory which was beyond any dreamed of by few except himself. The legislature which assembled in the following January was overwhelmingly Democratic, and immediately set to work to undo the exasperating evils which had been wrought by the alien and hybrid government which I have described. Impeachment proceedings were lodged against the governor, who was a carpetbagger pure and simple. His counsel proposed that if these proceedings were dismissed he would resign.

The proposition was accepted; he did resign, immediately left the State, and has never put his foot in it since. The lieutenant-governor, who was a drunken negro, was impeached and removed for having accepted a bribe for granting a pardon. The superintendent of education, a carpetbag negro, was impeached and removed for corruption in office. This movement, so magnificently led by General GEORGE, and the beneficent results which followed it make up the first chapter in the emancipation of the State from its post-bellum afflictions. This great achievement naturally brought him into the field as a candidate for the seat in the United States Senate soon to become vacant.

His only competitor was Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar, one of the greatest of all Southern statesmen and a member of the House of Representatives, who had earned and was then in the full enjoyment of a brilliant national reputation. My acquaintance with Senator GEORGE was so intimate and my admiration of his abilities so great that, as a member of the State senate, I gave his candidacy my earnest support. He made a stout fight and was not many votes short, but Mr. Lamar was chosen. He accepted the result as might have been expected of a man of his fiber, and without murmur or repining resumed the active practice of his profession. In 1880 there was a hotly contested triangular fight for the seat in the United States Senate to become vacant in March, 1881.

With the consent and hearty support of one of the contestants, who withdrew for that purpose, Senator GEORGE, in the midst of the fight, was placed before the legislature as a candidate and elected. In this movement I was again his earnest and cordial supporter. His career in the Senate, which began in 1881 and only ended with his death in 1897, more than justified the hopes and expectations of the people of Mississippi. He actively participated in its proceedings, and was a striking and masterful figure in all the great debates which occurred while he was a member of that body. He was not outmeasured in intellectual stature nor surpassed in honorable achievement by any of his colleagues.

I will not pause to point out particular performances of this great Senator, for his notable exploits are so numerous that I would scarcely know where to begin, or, beginning, where to end. Though constantly engaged in the discussion and consideration of great national subjects, he was ever pondering over the dangers still pressing upon his beloved State because of the dense ignorance, illiteracy, and incapacity which envelop so large a part of its inhabitants. While, since the great victory won in 1875 under his splendid leadership, there had been continuous control of its affairs by the more intelligent and virtuous of its citizens, at times this control had been hardly maintained, and it remained constantly exposed to attack by the same forces which had then been overthrown.

He determined to call upon the people of the State to meet in convention and remodel their constitution, so that danger from this source might be measurably, if not altogether, averted. With that end avowedly in view, he took the stump in the summer and fall of 1890. He was opposed by many who believed that it was impossible under the provisions of the act of 1870, under which the State had been readmitted to representation in Congress, and under the limitations contained in the amendments to the Federal Constitution, to achieve the purpose he contemplated, and to try and fail would only add to the complexities of the situation.

Again I placed myself under his standard and contributed such influence as I possessed to the advancement of his design. The issue of "convention or no convention" was fairly presented to the people, and a majority of the members of the legislature chosen in November of that year were in sympathy with his views. A convention was called, and assembled in the summer of 1890, and he left his place in the United States Senate to take his seat as one of its delegates. He denied the validity of the readmission act of 1870 in so far as it assumed to withhold from the State the power to alter the franchise provisions of the constitution of 1860, and insisted that by the very nature of the Federal compact this Union is made up of coequal States.

The convention, agreeing with him in this view, set to work to frame a constitution. It is needless to describe the differences of opinion engendered and the difficulties encountered. There were times when it seemed as though all effort would come to naught. The convention was a body of unusually able men, but amidst them all his was the saving presence. While credit is due to many for the work done by that convention, he was facile princeps. In accordance with the practice of the people of the State, when left to manage their own affairs, the constitution framed by that convention was promulgated without being submitted to them for ratification. It is true that the constitution of 1890 was submitted for ratification, but that was not the act of the people of the State, but the act of Congress.

In the session of the United States Senate next succeeding its promulgation, this constitution was violently and relentlessly assailed. I know of nothing in the annals of Congress at all to be compared with Senator GEORGE's defense of it on the floor of the Senate. His adversaries were literally overwhelmed by his skill in debate, his masterful logic, and the infinite wealth of his learning. Brushing aside almost contemptuously the insinuations, innuendoes, and implied charges so copiously indulged in, he boldly challenged them to indicate in what particular the State of Mississippi had transcended its powers, or to point out so much as a single clause in the constitution adopted by it which was in contravention of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Federal Constitution. No answer came, and, so far as the United States Senate is concerned, the attack upon Mississippi's constitution has never been renewed from that day to this. In an opinion recently delivered by the Supreme Court of the United States its validity has been expressly affirmed.

Inasmuch as Senator GEORGE's name and fame are so largely identified with this constitution, and inasmuch as it has been so grossly misrepresented, justice to his memory seems to require that some brief explanation should be made of its provisions, in so far as they relate to the elective franchise. To be a qualified elector one must have paid all taxes which have been legally required of him for the two preceding years, and this payment must have been made on or before the 1st day of February of the year in which he offers to vote. If he owns no property, he must pay a poll tax of at least $2 if he desires to vote. This poll tax is not a lien on property exempt from taxation, and as very few negroes own more property than is exempt, as to them it may be said that its payment is purely optional.

At the time when it must be paid issues have not been made up and there is no political excitement. Many white persons, even those who are large property owners, sometimes carelessly fail to pay their taxes by the prescribed date, and so lose their right to vote. It is but natural, moreover, that many who are poor should conclude that it is better to save the two-dollar poll tax than to pay it for the privilege of voting.

This tax provision is more effectual than all the other provisions of the constitution combined in cutting off the negro vote. Among other things, one must be able to read a section of the constitution, or if he can not read he must understand it when read to him or be able to give a reasonable interpretation of it.

This provision has been criticised as being devised for the purpose of admitting the illiterate white man to the franchise and excluding the illiterate black man, the charge being that this would be accomplished by the registrar in the case of the white man deciding that he understood or gave a reasonable interpretation of the section of the constitution read to him, and always holding the contrary as to the black man. This clause had its foundation in no such design. The State is divided into what are known as white counties and black counties. The former, having a majority of white persons, were but little troubled with the evils of ignorant suffrage, while the latter, having a majority of negroes, were in constant excitement and turmoil in the effort to keep their county governments under intelligent control.

The delegates from the black counties insisted on a radical educational or property qualification, or both. The white counties opposed this on the ground that there were white men who, though illiterate, were intelligent and sensible and entirely capable of exercising the right of suffrage with sagacity and good judgment. They objected to any restriction that would disfranchise men of that class. The understanding clause, as it has come to be designated, was devised by the genius of Senator GEORGE as a compromise, and without it it may be doubted whether any agreement could have been reached by the convention. Experience has shown that its importance was greatly exaggerated by the convention, and that it has little or no effect in the black counties and scarcely more in the white counties.

Indeed, investigation has shown that more blacks than whites have registered under it. Such is the much-abused constitution of Mississippi so far as it relates to the suffrage. The criticisms of it were disposed of summarily by Justice McKenna, who said of its provisions:

They reach weak and vicious white men as well as weak and vicious black men, and whatever is sinister in their intention, if anything, can be prevented by both races by the exertion of that duty which voluntarily pays taxes and refrains from crime.

While many able men participated in its preparation and rendered most valuable service, yet Senator GEORGE by common consent is conceded to be its chief architect, and he builded a monument for himself which will make him famous and celebrated in the annals of the State for all time to come.

With its enactment came a feeling of security and restfulness that can only be realized by those who know what it is to struggle without ceasing, and almost without hope, to avert the evils and dangers which ever accompany the domination of ignorance. It came to the people of the State like a new declaration of independence. Purification and regeneration have made life and property secure, and the State is now the abiding place of law and order. The adoption of this constitution ends the second chapter, and all good men should pray that it may be the last, in the emancipation of the State from its post-bellum afflictions. Senator GEORGE has often been described as the great commoner of Mississippi. It were far better that he be designated its great liberator.

In 1891, what is known as the subtreasury plan had attracted the keenest attention, not only in Mississippi, but in many Southern and Western States. It was the chief subject of discussion, and was undoubtedly taking deep root in the minds of many. Some of the brightest and strongest men of the Democratic party were captivated by it, and were pushing it with eloquence, zeal, and vigor.

The legislature to be chosen in the fall of that year was to elect a Senator to succeed Senator GEORGE, whose term was to expire in 1893. To oppose it seemed to invite defeat, but Senator GEORGE at once declared it to be unconstitutional and illusory, and canvassed the State with such power and aggressiveness that he not only overcame it in Mississippi, but utterly destroyed its root and branch in whatever section of the country it had invaded.

His canvass attracted the most widespread attention, and the courage and skill with which he fought and conquered it commanded universal admiration. In this struggle, as in all others in which his fame or political fortunes were involved, I was his earnest and steadfast supporter. What man of this generation has to his credit greater deeds, or more useful, than these that I have recounted? Who has surpassed him in constructive ability, or in the power to conceive and press to successful conclusion the broadest and most beneficent designs? What Mississippi statesman has rendered her loftier or more substantial service than he did in leading the historic uprising of 1875, and in giving her a constitution in 1890 which safeguards her civilization against the assaults and dangers of ignorance and prejudice? What son of hers ever bore himself more ably and bravely in the council halls of the nation? These questions can have but one response. It was his lot to live in stirring times and amidst great events.

As a young man he was a soldier of the Mexican war. He was again a soldier in the great conflict between the States. I have already told of the part he bore in the trying times which came to the people of the South with the surrender at Appomattox. Under these and all other circumstances he played the part of a man—of a great man. He was loved and admired and trusted by the people of his State beyond my power to describe. When the hour for his going from them struck, a rude shock came to every home and fireside, and it seemed the lamentation would never cease.

His great deeds will live forever in the history of Mississippi, and by their side his fame will find a perpetual abiding place.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, August 14, 1897, having passed his seventieth birthday, JAMES Z. GEORGE, a Senator from the State of Mississippi, was transferred from this world into the great beyond. On occasions like this we are sometimes tempted to indulge in extravagant word praise of the dead that would be resented by the subject of our remarks were he living. It is my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to utter a few words on this occasion regarding our coworker in national legislation that shall describe him as he was and as he intended to be, both in public and in private life; words that Senator GEORGE would not be ashamed to have spoken were he sitting in yonder galleries or on this floor and looking his fellow-men in the eye.

A firm believer in the immortality of the soul, of the eternal living of all mankind, I would speak here not as a mourner for one eternally dead, but as one telling to the world the story of the useful life of a great and a good man gone on before to explore the shores and fields and cities of the better land. As men describe it, JAMES Z. GEORGE is dead, but as God has ordained it, he is just beginning to live. Personally he is gone from our sight, but intellectually he is still with us. We can no longer take him by the hand, or yield to the charm of his conversation, or be swayed by his logic in debate, but we remember his gentlemanly deportment, the dignity and courtesy of his manner, the words he spoke, and the wise counsel he gave, and benefited by all that was good in what he said or did, we truly say Senator GEORGE still lives.

The State of Georgia was his birthplace and the State of Mississippi his home. He was a Southerner, prejudiced in favor of the South, as he ought to have been, but a lover of his country and of his whole country, of the flag of our Union, and of human liberty. In early youth he volunteered as a private, and in the war with Mexico, which insured the independence of Texas and extended the territory and power of this nation, won distinction by that faithful adherence to and discharge of every duty which so characterized him in later life. When that war was ended he entered the walks of civil life and chose the profession of the law, one of the most, if not the most, honorable of all professions. He never disgraced it, but constantly labored to elevate the standing of all its members, and by his example and teachings did much to add to the dignity, purity, and learning of both bench and bar.

As a lawyer he was of the first, and as reporter of the high court of errors and appeals he did careful and painstaking and most useful work that shall cause him to be remembered and honored so long as law is obeyed and respected and as long as lovers of law and order exist. He was a most careful, laborious, and painstaking lawyer. He loved justice and knew that only through proper laws and their just interpretation and rigid enforcement could justice be obtained and good government maintained. He despised trickery in the profession and had no regard for those who sought to win their cases in court through technicalities or tricks of the trade. He was always laboring for the enactment of beneficial laws both in the State and National Legislatures. The common good of all was his constant aim. He stood so well before the people and with the profession that he was made judge of the supreme court of the State of Mississippi, and by his associates was made chief justice. These marks of esteem were merited, and the confidence reposed was not betrayed.

In the meantime, and not long after his entry into the profession of the law, the storm of civil war broke over the country. He was with his State, and an ardent advocate of the right of a State to secede. He had the courage of his convictions and was willing to lay down his life for a cause he sincerely believed to be just. He enlisted early in the Confederate armies and rose to the rank of brigadier-general of State troops and colonel in the regular army. He shirked no duty, evaded no responsibility, but was brave and devoted and self-reliant as a soldier.

When the war was ended he indulged in no recriminations or repinings, but at once entered on the duties of citizenship, determined to rehabilitate his State as an integral part of an undivided country; and through all the dark and trying days of the reconstruction period he demonstrated that as a fair, open-hearted, loyal man his duty and purpose were to rebuild the whole country and firmly cement the union of the States. He accepted the results of the war as a final determination of the case, and at once went energetically to work to make the decision final and the perpetual law of the land. He neither looked for nor sought a retrial, but accepted the verdict and judgment as final. Ever afterwards did he respect it; and were he living to-day no citizen of this land would rejoice more fervently than he to see the boys from every section of the Union—East, West, North, and South—touching elbows and keeping step to the tap of the drum under the banner of a united nation.

He was one of the first to realize that the boys who wore the blue and those who wore the gray should never again meet as foes, but side by side in peace advance the common good and shoulder to shoulder in war meet the common foe in the forefront of the battle. He desired the prosperity of his own State, but not at the expense of any other. When the highest judicial honors his State could give had been conferred, he did not sink into national obscurity, nor was he content with the ease and permanence of a judicial position, but at the call of the people of his State entered the Senate of the United States, where a broader field of usefulness was opened before him. He served on many important committees, but he did his best work as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, where his ripe learning in the law, his keen logic, his quick perception, his lucidity of statement, and his thoroughness of investigation won him high standing among the legal giants with whom he was associated.

He possessed an honest and a discriminating mind. He was opposed to all "catch" legislation and believed that there was more danger in too much than in too little statutory law. He had a firm, abiding faith in his fellow-men and believed they could maintain good government with little law if properly educated and rightly guided. He had faith in the people and refused to recognize the "divine right of kings," but did recognize and respect the divine right of men. He sympathized with the people, and any invasion of their rights met his immediate protest and opposition. He had no sympathy with oppression of any kind from any source and had an abiding faith in the ability of the people to govern themselves. He was the bitter foe of anarchy and lawlessness, laziness and shiftlessness, dishonesty and treachery.

His best efforts were always given to the upbuilding and maintenance of good order in the community, and as a lawyer he was usually on the right side of every litigation in which he took part, for the reason that he would have no part in attempting to bolster up or sustain a wrong. He was a practical man, and with him life was a business, not a show or a sentiment. He was a religious man, and conscientious. There was no pretentiousness about Senator GEORGE. His victories were won in fair battle, not by trickery or diplomacy. He did not pin his heart to his coat sleeve or air his opinions to the world unless occasion demanded; but when action was imperative, no one was more outspoken than he. His language was plain, concise, and pointed. He did not use words to conceal thought.

He loved nature. The woods and fields and mountains charmed him, for they were real and God's handiwork. He loved all of God's creatures, and was happy when among the dumb animals, who always had his kind care and attention. He saw but little about him to condemn, except the meanness of men, and he never saw this unless it was forced upon his attention. Few men have won a higher place in the estimation of their fellow-men than did Senator GEORGE. He was a man of ability, judgment, and character. He was a worker, not a drone. He was able and willing to earn his living anywhere. His entry into politics was not for fame or glory or pecuniary gain.

He was in favor of good legislation and saw an opportunity to do good work for his people and his country, and so accepted the high honors conferred and became first a just judge and then one of the hardest and most faithful workers in the Senate of the United States. But little escaped his vigilant eye, and a bad measure always met his vehement opposition and denunciation. He was swayed but little by policy; was always searching for the necessity and the justice of a proposed law. With him whatever was right and necessary was expedient, and whatever was unnecessary or wrong was not only inexpedient but positively harmful. In interpreting a statute he searched for the intent of the law-making body, and when found, sought to enforce it. He was always willing to oblige his coworkers if consistent with an honest and faithful discharge of duty, but he would not do or consent to a wrong to please any man.

Mr. Speaker, in the death of Senator GEORGE the Senators and Representatives in Congress lost a friend and a considerate and faithful coworker, the State of Mississippi lost one of her ablest and most respected citizens and public men, and the United States lost the services of one of its strongest, most faithful, and zealous Senators. For nine years I had known him as a legislator, and I shall always remember him as a magnificent type of American citizenship. If we disagreed, it was in the most friendly way and without a break in personal friendly relations. He fully recognized the right of other men to think and act for themselves and always respected the feelings of those with whom duty compelled him to differ.

Of his home life I will not speak. Those who knew him and saw him at his home with his family and home friends, at the fireside and social circle, can describe him as he was there, but we who only knew him in public life are sure that he must have been loving and kind and generous and gentle at the family hearth. He could not have been otherwise, for there was no littleness or meanness in his nature.

He is gone to a better land and a higher work. To a land not of golden streets and gilded towers and silvered minarets and white-robed angels doing nothing forever and forever, but to one, as he pictured it, where the fields are ever green, the flowers ever bloom, men and women continue to work and improve, and God's children are nearer home.

He is beyond the tumult of war, the necessities of legislation, and the contentions of courts. He sees with a clear vision, hears with precision, understands God's ways, and is doing the work of the Grand Master of the universe.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I am here to-day to unite with my colleagues and other friends in paying tribute to the memory of the late Senator J. Z. GEORGE, of the State of Mississippi. In addresses already delivered and others that are prepared an analysis of his character and the leading achievements of his active life are more ably presented than I am capable of doing. So that I find it unnecessary for me to attempt anything like a thorough sketch of his life and great public career.

Mr. Speaker, Senator GEORGE was what is ordinarily termed a self-made man, but no man could have been what he was who had not inherited a splendid mind and a robust constitution. He was self-made in the sense that unaided by fortune or influential relationships, by his own industry and force of character, he rose from the position of a poor boy to that of one of the great men of this great nation.

I have never known a man whose career presented a more encouraging example to the young men of our country of the splendid possibilities that open up to those born without wealth or illustrious parentage. To have risen unaided from poverty and obscurity to be a great lawyer, a great judge of the supreme court of his State, and one of the most profound constitutional lawyers who ever occupied a seat in the Senate of the United States makes a career in which all his countrymen can justly feel a pride.

Senator GEORGE held many positions of responsibility and trust, the duties of all of which he discharged with great thoroughness and ability; and it might not be inappropriate at this time to remark that he never owed any of his selections or promotions to the wealth of his family or the distinguished position held by his father. What he got he worked for and merited.

We are accustomed sometimes to speak of the disadvantages he had to contend against in being thrown on his own resources in his youth. But, Mr. Speaker, if the boy has in him the elements of true manhood, I doubt if these are really disadvantages, for I think the history of our country shows that from this class come most of our greatest men. When it is said of any man that he honored every draft and fulfilled every duty that good citizenship ever required of him, it is saying a great deal.

It can be said of Senator GEORGE that he measured fully up to this high standard as a citizen. During his lifetime his country was involved in two wars—one with Mexico, in his young manhood, and one between the States, in his maturer years. He was a soldier in both, and in both courageously did his duty as he saw it.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Mississippi loved, trusted, and honored Senator GEORGE, and the more they honored and trusted him the more worthy they found him of their trust. He was one of the people; he always had their interest at heart; he appreciated their affection and their confidence, and I believe I can truly say that, in my opinion, no man connected with the history of the State of Mississippi has contributed more, if any have contributed as much, to the material welfare of our State as the late J. Z. GEORGE, and if I were called on to pick out the most conspicuous services for which our people are indebted to him, I would say it was the part taken by him in two achievements so well related by my colleague, General CATCHINGS, who has just addressed you. The one in his great leadership in the great political revolution in Mississippi in 1875, when our very civilization was threatened and our people driven almost to despair by the corrupt and profligate government administered by aliens, who had taken advantage of conditions made possible after the close of the war by the enfranchisement of a great mass of ignorant negroes without any conception of the responsibility of citizenship.

Senator GEORGE's splendid leadership in that campaign, loyally aided as he was by almost all of the property holders and white people of the State, rescued our government from the hands of the despoilers and inspired our people with new hope. But the question as to whether intelligence should continue to control the destiny of the State or whether ignorance, under the manipulation of Federal statutes, should regain control had not been finally settled, and those of us who were associated with Senator GEORGE will always remember how much concern the situation gave him and how anxious he was to remedy it.

This feeling of uncertainty was a great drawback to the development of our State and a matter of great solicitude with all of our people, and especially with Senator GEORGE. It was then that he began the agitation for a constitutional convention in our State and which he did more to secure than any other one man. Many of us doubted the practicability of accomplishing anything in the direction Senator GEORGE was seeking to steer the convention.

But he persevered, accepted a seat in the convention from the State at large, and was easily the leading spirit in this convention composed of many of our ablest men. That convention under his leadership accomplished more than the most sanguine friends of the movement thought it possible to accomplish toward settling race antagonisms and toward securing for many years to come, at least, the control of the government by the more intelligent and responsible classes of our people.

I do not believe there is an intelligent and patriotic citizen of Mississippi who has not since the adoption of this constitution felt a sense of safety and security that he had not felt before since the negro was enfranchised; and my own judgment is that the present constitution of Mississippi is the greatest achievement of this great man's long and useful career, and I trust it will be, as it should be, his most lasting monument.

In 1891 what was known as the subtreasury scheme became the leading issue in the campaign in Mississippi. It was temptingly put before the farmers as a measure for their especial relief. Senator GEORGE was known and recognized as their great friend and champion, and as such those who had been made to believe in the efficacy of this scheme as a measure of relief for them expected Senator GEORGE to go with them in advocacy of the same. But when his opinion was asked, he came out with a strong letter demonstrating the utter impracticability of the proposed measure and his opposition thereto, and announced his candidacy for reelection to the Senate and went before the people mainly on this issue.

It was my fortune to participate with him in this campaign; we traveled together and spoke together in different portions of the State. I was greatly impressed everywhere we went with the large gatherings that turned out to hear him, and the eager, patient, and respectful attention with which they listened to his arguments; and I attribute his great victory that year very largely to the confidence the farmers and many of the Farmers' Alliance men felt not only in his judgment, but in his devotion to their interest, and I remember well how it pained him to find so many of his old friends among the plain people, whom he had served so long and so well, had become so thoroughly committed in their judgments to the subtreasury plan that in their disappointment at his failure to agree with them they began to question his motives and heap abuse on him where they had been accustomed before that to praise him.

This was with him a matter of genuine regret. But, happily, most of them came back to be his genuine friends and admirers long before his death.

Mr. Speaker, if I were to speak of the characteristics of Senator GEORGE that I thought contributed most largely to his success, I would mention first his practical common sense, which is, after all, the best sort of sense; second, his great capacity for mental labor and the thoroughness with which he did his work—in this, I think, he excelled any man I ever knew—and lastly, the tenacity with which he adhered to his well-formed purposes and the moral and physical courage he exercised in maintaining them.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], in his very much appreciated remarks about Senator GEORGE, spoke of his anxiety for the welfare of the whole country. While this was true, his greatest concern was for the welfare of the masses of the people of his own loved State; the people with whom his active life had been mainly spent; the people who had heaped their highest honors on him and whom he had served so long and so well.

I have often thought about it, that I never came back from Mississippi that he did not inquire with genuine interest and concern how the people were getting along; were they getting out of debt, were they raising their own supplies, and their prospects generally? All the good news about them seemed to please him and the bad news to distress him. And this, Mr. Speaker, accounts for the great love the people had for him in his lifetime and their great sorrow at his death. It is hard to fool the people long; they soon learn whether or not the professions of interest in them by a public man are sincere or feigned.

I attended Senator GEORGE's funeral in the town of Carrollton. It was held in one of the prettiest churches in a country town the size of Carrollton you will see anywhere, and his generosity had contributed very largely to the building of this church, which had been recently completed. I heard his pastor, the Rev. Dr. Johnson, pay him there among his neighbors one of the finest tributes I ever heard paid any man. I saw gathered there a great crowd of his neighbors and friends, who showed by all they said and did the great love and respect they had for him while living and their sincere sorrow at his death.

I heard his pastor tell about how often Senator GEORGE talked to him about his great concern for and interest in the poor and his generous charity to them. I went out to his home near Carrollton; it was his country home. He liked the country, and very much preferred to live on the farm to living in town; his house was one of the grand, old-fashioned Southern home houses, on an elevation surrounded by trees, many of which he had himself planted; there was his well-arranged office and library in the yard. It was an ideal place for a man who had performed his life work as well as Senator GEORGE to spend his declining years, surrounded by his loved ones, with so many things about the place to interest him.

I could but regret while there that as Senator GEORGE had made up his mind to retire from public life at the end of the term he was then serving in the Senate and as his life had been up to that time such a busy one, he could not have had a few years at least of rest and recreation in this beautiful home, surrounded by his children and grandchildren, friends and neighbors, amid scenes that I am sure would have been pleasant and interesting to him. I am sure this was his intention, and I am sorry it was not to be.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, in the death of Senator GEORGE Mississippi lost one of the greatest men she has ever produced—and all Mississippians feel a just pride in the great men our State has produced—and I can express no better wish for my State than that those of her public men now living and those who are to come after may measure up to the standard of the public men who have passed away.

Mr. Speaker, Senator GEORGE was a dutiful son, a faithful and loving husband, a kind and indulgent father, a true and loyal friend, a good neighbor, a great lawyer, a great judge, a great Senator, and an exceptionally good citizen.

Mr. Speaker, when this much can be truly said of our deceased friend, what more need be said? I think all those who have an interest in his reputation and cherish his memory should be gratified to know that all this can be truly said of J. Z. GEORGE.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I regret that circumstances prevent me from paying suitable tribute to the life and character of the distinguished departed Senator from Mississippi. Senator GEORGE's public life, as has just been stated by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN], was a fitting illustration of the splendid possibilities of American citizenship. His death was the end of a long and useful career, characterized by ability, integrity, and patriotic devotion to conviction and to duty. It gives me pleasure to add a tribute to-day to his high social, moral, professional, and statesmanlike qualifications. Senator GEORGE lived long, worked diligently, achieved grandly, and died in confident faith in another and better life beyond the stars.

Mr. Speaker, with him death was but "transition" to a life where the flowers forever bloom, where the birds forever sing, where there are forever and forever music and song and joy. He was honest, he was capable, and he was patriotic. In every relationship of life he measured fully up to its requirements, whether as father, husband, churchman, citizen, or Senator. What more, Mr. Speaker, need be said in memory of this faithful servant of the people?

But, Mr. Speaker, let me add merely that all of this service will have been in vain unless it prompt the endeavor on our part to emulate his stainless public and private life.

There are no dead, we fall asleep,
To waken where they never weep.
We close our eyes on pain and sin,
Our breath ebbs out, but life flows in.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I shall not enter into a narrative from birth to death of the life and career, as strange as fiction, of JAMES Z. GEORGE, late a Senator from the State of Mississippi. A bare outline of his life, beginning with the schoolboy working by day and studying at night by fire light, down to the moment when he refused beforehand a third election to a seat in the Senate of the United States, reads more like fiction than biography.

It furnishes an excellent example of what ability unaided and courage and industry unfavored could work out for their possessor in the field of equal opportunity furnished to all in the earlier and better days of the Republic. Suffice it for me to say that from small beginnings he had made of himself an exhaustive law writer; a great, prosperous, and rich law practitioner and planter; an able judge, whose opinions convinced by their very statement; a successful party organizer of a whole race in his native State at a critical and semirevolutionary period; a great Senator, whose excellence of judgment, especially in dealing with questions of American constitutional law, was everywhere recognized.

Nor shall I give a chronological schedule of his acts of public service, which would require a much larger space than I have at my disposal for their correct setting down. All these things have been said and will be said by others older and more able to say them than I. I shall only utter a few words of the kind which one of two friends left behind may speak at the closed grave of the other, who has moved away from among men, leaving behind him only the lifeless and buried casket which once bodied him forth to their eyes.

I shall prefer to speak of him as I knew him—as something present—the product, as all men are, of heredity, environment, and conscious purpose.

His heredity was simple. In his veins flowed the blood of generations of hard-fighting, hard-working, soil-tilling, English-speaking ancestry.

From it came a clean, healthy, natural intellect, housed in a great, healthy, warlike body; both body and mind capable of indefinite growth, expansion, and cultivation, with nothing abnormal, nothing degenerate, weakly sentimental, or maudlin about either. There went with them power and courage to face either the quick threat of danger or the slow wearing of hardship.

His environment you all know. It was that of his time, his class, his section and its institutions. He shared to the full its masterful virtues, to some extent its prejudices. He met fully all its tasks of suffering and achievement.

His purpose was to do honestly and with conscientious and unshrinking laboriousness whatever the time and its problems demanded to be done, and if it was political or legislative work, to do it with the confident hope of making his working contribute to the betterment of the condition of the masses—those masses whose lives are so isolated and whose minds are so absorbed in the drudgery of ceaseless manual occupation.

Senator GEORGE, Mr. Speaker, was neither born great nor did he have greatness thrust upon him. He achieved it. It came by no accident. It came by no favor. It never entered his mind to expect any good fortune except as the result of his own steady, sturdy, persistent, industrious, and intelligent effort. In fact, with his way of thinking, to obtain prosperity and honors, the reward, without giving labor, the price, would have been akin to cheating humanity out of its good opinion.

Under his great shaggy coat was a heart so simple and tender that it was childlike.

His capacity for physical and mental labor was immense—to the average man marvelous.

His mind was like his body, large, healthy to robustness, reveling, as great, sturdy bodies and minds must do, in exercise as its only appropriate element.

When he was over 70, the allotted age of man, he still rose with the sun, and although he went to bed almost as early as the lark, he counted it no strange nor unusual thing to sit at his desk studying, reading, examining, annotating—working persistently, working cheerfully, working untiringly, day by day, nine, ten full hours each day. I once thought that he reveled in work for work's sake, just as others revel in pleasure for pleasure's sake; but I found that he never worked without a purpose, and that each five minutes of persistent industry brought him nearer the consummation of some chosen and important task.

As a consequence of his remarkable healthfulness of mind and body and his resulting capacity for labor, it may be said, without invidiousness, that he left a larger and more lasting imprint upon the laws and the institutions of his native State, if not of the Union, than any other Mississippian. His ideas, whether embodied in leading cases, as announced by him from the bench of our supreme court or in the organic law as promulgated in our present and incomparable constitution, or as existing in the make-up and spirit of the Democratic or white man's party in Mississippi, which he guided in "the better and the middle way" during its formative period beginning in 1875, meet you at every turn. His defense of the institutions of his State and of the necessity for them in her peculiar social, industrial, and political condition meet you at every step in the study of the proceedings and debates of the Senate.

He it was who, as the directing spirit of the Mississippi constitutional convention, solved, for this generation at least, the seemingly insoluble problem of rendering impossible the rule of a vicious and ignorant majority, while making violence and revolutionary methods unnecessary, and yet, with it all, leaving the Constitution of the United States immaculate and unviolated. His work mainly it was which has made possible the preservation of civilization in the State of Mississippi, by putting it on a firm foundation of equity, law, and right, and which has pointed a present way out of their difficulties to the other States of the South.

He it was who, when his work was done, defended it in the Senate of the United States with such matchless historical and legal knowledge to the minutest detail and with such power of analysis and breadth of unanswerable analogy that the one attack then made was the last ever made upon it in that greatest of all parliamentary bodies. It will remain for the future historian to record that he has left, yet in manuscript, the clearest and fullest narrative of the so-called Southern issue as it existed before and after the civil war.

There was about Senator GEORGE, Mr. Speaker, no glitter, no tinsel, no meretricious graces; there was only a shield of just intent, impervious to darts; only a sledge-hammer weight of argument which literally beat down the antagonist.

Others might fight like Saladin with a Damascus blade; he fought like lion-hearted Richard with a battle-ax, which no inferior arm could so much as wield; which no skill, no discipline in the schools could resist; which could at most be evaded only, if even that.

It was not without reason that the people of Mississippi called Senator GEORGE the "Old Commoner."

In the sense in which it was true of a tribune of the people in ancient Rome it was true of J. Z. GEORGE, that he was chief of the plebeians, and he was proud of his office—an office not fixed by statute nor filled by election, but one into which he was fitted by environment and sympathy and which he filled by process of natural selection.

In the midst of all changes, all surroundings, he remained a typical Mississippi farmer in manners, in easy accessibility, in sympathy, and, moreover, in self-judgment. Sturdy, serious, independent, self-confident, industrious, truth-speaking though ever so bluntly, proud of his class and his section, he was the very type of a class of yeomanry who with some faults have two supreme virtues which of themselves are sufficient to make any people possessing them great—virtues against which all temptations break like waves upon a rock. Those two cardinal virtues of the Southern agricultural class of which he was a type are these: They can not be scared; they can not be bought.

The farmer has been called the "forgotten man." He is the man pressed about prior to elections, forgotten afterwards.

So numerous, so active, and so well organized to make themselves heard and felt are other classes and so persistent are they in their demands that they leave the legislator but little time or leisure to think broadly and deeply of the "forgotten man."

But, whether in private life or in public office, the "unorganized masses," especially those engaged in the absorbing pursuit of agriculture, were never absent from the mind of our late Senator. He could not have thrust them from his thought had he desired to do so. It would have been to thrust aside his own identity. He was bone of their bone, sinew of their sinew; his thought was the highest type of their thought.

They constituted for him "the people"—not theoretically only, because they are a majority of the population, but practically and actually. The idea that anything antagonistic to their real interests could be for the best interest of the State or the nation was for him not even thinkable. It was unthinkable. To him the conviction, founded on observation and history, that all other interests are subordinate to the great agricultural interest and dependent upon its prosperity, immediately or remotely, not only for their own prosperity, but for their very life, was self-evident.

Not all the sophistry in the world nor the ablest special pleading could have obtained from him a moment's sympathetic consideration of the proposition that a nation could be made great or a people happy by taxing the capital and labor invested in agriculture in order that capital invested in manufactures might obtain a better profit, or that manufacturing labor might enjoy higher wages.

Not only from the political standpoint, but viewing the man in his private life from a social standpoint, it was not without reason that his people called him the "Old Commoner."

Whether as a barefooted boy, now attending the common schools of Carroll County, now working in the field; whether as a lad, trudging over the dirt roads while he drove the team that hauled his mother's cotton the long, dreary way from Carroll to the head of navigation at Yazoo for shipment; whether as a private soldier in the First Mississippi Rifles, marching proudly under the eyes of Col. Jefferson Davis or charging at Monterey; whether as a successful lawyer and frugal and prosperous planter and business man; whether on the field in the command of his regiment of Confederate soldiers, fighting for the right to secede, for which he had voted and spoken; whether in his capacity as reporter of the Mississippi supreme court or in that of judge of that court; whether wielding the power of an almost-dictator as chairman of the executive committee of his party in the revolutionary campaign of 1875; whether in his seat as a Senator in the Congress of the United States or at home dispensing the generous and open-door hospitality of a Southern planter, he was always the same J. Z. GEORGE—the same JIM GEORGE, as his neighbors called him—always a "commoner" and always earnest; indefatigable in labor, delving to the bottom of every problem, minutely attentive to each detail, honest in purpose and conviction, brave in execution, carrying fidelity to friends to a point where it sometimes seemed a fault, remembering always the lines—

Those friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,
Grapple them to thy soul with hooks of steel—repaying favors, even fancied favors, personal or political, three-fold, tenfold; fond of his plantation, kind to his servants, indulgent to his children; in love with his wife and she in love with him.

No sweeter picture has it ever been my fortune to behold than that of these two old people—he past 70, she not much younger—with their childlike affection and mutual confidence—a confidence and affection not spoken, but easily seen of all men—surrounded by their children and grandchildren, both knowing that Death had set his seal on the brow of each, yet gliding hand in hand, as contentedly as mortals may, into the awful abyss.

Senator GEORGE was one of the wealthiest men in Mississippi. This might have been expected as the natural result of his frugality, industry, and robust intellectuality. But wealth did not change him nor add one jot nor one tittle to his just opinion of himself nor contort his opinion of things beyond himself.

Washington did not spoil him; its glitter did not deceive him; its stupid pretensions did not awe him; its temptations did not allure him; his friends were still his old friends at home; the gods whom he worshiped here were still the gods whom he had worshiped amid the sweet hills of Mississippi—the lares and penates—the gods of the household and of the hearthstone.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, it would be difficult to add to the tributes already paid to the memory of the distinguished Senator from the State of Mississippi. As a man, a lawyer, and a statesman he has been painted and pictured in colors to which I feel that I hardly can contribute anything.

It was my good fortune to know Senator GEORGE—General GEORGE, as many of his admirers called him—and I am proud in the belief that he regarded me as one of his friends; and it is a sad pleasure to me, now that he is dead, to lay my tribute of admiration and friendship upon his bier.

There has been said of him here this afternoon much that can be said truthfully of but very few men, and yet of him it has been spoken truthfully. From a small beginning, with no advantages in early life, with struggles all along the way, with many and great difficulties to contend with and overcome, he achieved such success as few reach and none better deserve. Born in poverty, through toil and privation, with such education only as he could acquire, despite disadvantages, by extraordinary effort, he climbed steadily to the heights of fame in a country where, while the highest places are open to the competition of all, none but a few superior men can reach them and fill them acceptably when they do rise to them.

I happened to live with Senator GEORGE in the same house in this city for two or three winters. I knew him quite well, through that everyday intercourse in the unconventional friendship which grows up between those thus thrown together, and holding the same views concerning great issues. So I know that what has just been said, and said beautifully, concerning his domestic relations, being the simple truth, is merited praise and glory for him and for his noble wife. She, as well as he, was a superior being. They were unlike, and yet in some things very much alike. He, sturdy as an oak, stern, plain, thorough-going, tireless, unconquerable, yet generous and kindly; she, tender, gentle, cheerful, noble, having as lovely elements of heart and mind as ever are given to the daughters of Eve.

The hand of death for years was upon her. Stricken, sorely stricken, it was only a question of time when she would go, and all along the appearances and indications were that her time of departure was not far distant. The tenderness of this very strong man toward this woman, strong, too, in spirit, but physically weak, was lovely in its strength and simplicity. Gentle as he could be, tender as it was possible for anyone to be, he was devoted through all the long years of her affliction to the wife whose weakness found firm support in his strength. He was the sturdy, kindly oak; she the vine, flowering and fragrant, which could not live without the oak. So, united in life, they were separated but a little way in death, the one preceding the other but a short time on the long journey whose beginning only is open to mortal view. When one was gone, all who knew their relations well might predict that the other could not long survive.

As a lawyer, according to the judgment of those who knew him better than I, Senator GEORGE was almost without a peer. Possessed of a mind singularly strong and of wonderful constructive energy, thoroughly honest in his purposes, with an industry that was almost unparalleled, and a capacity for work truly wonderful, he steadily climbed to the highest round in the ladder of fame. That he was one of the greatest constitutional lawyers ever in the Congress of the United States in the whole history of the Republic is a fact that will stand the test of time and be evidenced by his works for many and many a day. He was one of the great representatives of a great State, a State that has given to public life so many conspicuously great men.

The service that he rendered to his State in the crucial time following the war, when wisdom and courage, patience and perseverance, were supremely necessary, can be estimated and appreciated better by Mississippians and by other people of his own Southland than by those of the State from which I hail or by the people from any other section of the Union. What it was to contend with the difficulties he had to encounter; what it was to overcome those difficulties; what it was to pilot his people, to carry them, through the stormy time that followed the war; to get them over and clear of the dangers that beset them; to establish them upon the rock of constitutional liberty and right—appealing to the intelligence and aspirations of superior manhood to hold them there—that would require time to outline and the history of years to disclose.

The constitution of this great State of Mississippi is a monument to the wisdom and the far-sightedness and the patriotism and the lofty purpose of this great man. Long, long after his passage from this earth, long after we who speak here in his praise this afternoon shall have been gathered to our fathers, that constitution will be the bulwark and protection of the people of his State. The children and children's children of the generations of those with whom Senator GEORGE mingled will gather the fruit of the goodly tree that he planted. In all the years that that instrument is held up to admiration, that it is clung to for protection, his memory must survive as a glorious inheritance.

As a legislator, too much can not be said in his praise. He was industrious, he was thoroughly honest, he was able—he combined all the qualities and all the characteristics necessary for a great lawgiver. And as my friend General CATCHINGS, my friend Mr. WILLIAMS, and my friend Mr. ALLEN have said, in language full of pathos and beauty, he never lost sight of the fundamental principles of our Government, but always recollected, and always realized, and always worked upon the theory, that the rights of the people are the great thing to be conserved.

No man could know Senator GEORGE even for a short time, even casually, without being impressed with the simplicity and the nobility of his character. From poverty he had advanced by his own exertions, conquering the way at every step, to a competency, even to riches. From the ignorance of the poor boy having no school advantages, having to toil long and hard, he worked and grew into the man of wisdom. From the humble chore boy about his mother's house, the poor laborer upon the farm, he became—thanks alone to his talents, perseverance, and integrity—a great lawyer, a great judge, a great constitution maker, a great Senator; one of the greatest among the great.

Yet after all this progress, this traveling upward and onward during the weary years—after he had reached fortune and fame, after he stood upon an eminence which very few ever reach—still he was the same plain, simple-minded man of the people. Here in the city of Washington he was as plain and simple in his habits as he was at his country home—as simple and plain in his methods and ways of doing business and in his intercourse with men in the magnificent capital of our country as he was upon the plantation where he loved to dwell, away back in Mississippi. His life proves that greatness is not measured by egotism, and that success need not have vanity for an attendant.

The race to which Senator GEORGE belonged, the style of man that he was, seems not to have too many representatives in public life at this time. How common it is for some people, when a little success attends their efforts, when promotion comes to them and the opportunity presents itself to rise (not in actual fact so much as in their own imagination) above their surroundings, in their own vaunted greatness, to look down upon those who by the accident or chance of fortune are beneath them, but who in all other respects are their superiors.

Senator GEORGE never felt that he had any rights except those which belong to the humblest of the people whom he represented, the humblest of the honest people of this land. His self-reliance was far above vulgar egotism, and vanity, that vice of little minds, never afflicted him.

In legislation he never sought for anything except that which he believed would be beneficial to the great mass of the American public. As has been said truly and eloquently this afternoon, he sought the legislation best for the people; and in determining whether a proposed measure was good or bad, he gauged it always, from beginning to end, by his judgment of its bearing and effect upon the masses of the people. That is the true democracy of our Republic—the true liberty-loving spirit in which to study legislation and to enact laws.

But how many people forget, how many depart from that ideal! How many do we find who, when they come to this great capital city, forget the humble people at home, by whose suffrages and confidence they are here! How many come here, fresh from the utterance at home of sentiments which they do not give much play in legislative life at this great and gorgeous capital! How many are there as careful here, under temptation, of the rights of the people who sent them here as in their professions at home, in order to get here, they seemed to be?

Whoever lost faith in fundamental principles, he did not. Whoever proved false to the people, Senator GEORGE was not found wanting. Whoever lacked in courage in trying times, his courage never failed. Whoever allowed himself to be deluded into the belief that legislation inspired and urged by the privileged few may somehow be beneficial to the oft-forgotten many, or not hurtful to them, Senator GEORGE never was thus blinded; Senator GEORGE never was thus misled. Faithful ever, Senator GEORGE was a marked man in all the years of his legislative life.

His career is a notable one in the history of our country. Of course, many men in our history have risen from poverty to affluence, have risen from the humblest station to the highest. Many have filled well the high stations to which they have climbed. But of which of them can it be said that in his life greater service has been rendered, that truer courage has been shown, that more steadfastness and devotion in the defense of fundamental principles have been exhibited, than in the career of Senator JAMES Z. GEORGE?

What can be added, what need be added, to the glory of such a man? A good husband, father, friend; a brave soldier in two wars; a patriot always and everywhere; a lawyer eminent at the bar and illustrious upon the bench; a legislator with hardly a superior and few equals. With all her great men, well may Mississippi place this great man high in her esteem and love. When the history of all of them is considered few will be found to stand above him.

Happy has that State been in her representation in Congress, when her own people could speak her own voice, when her own judgment could be consulted and was controlling in the selection. Strong in this House, strong in the other House—for years before the war and after the war, for years in peace and in war—Mississippi has been one of the proudest States of this Union, made illustrious by the services of her great men.

Of late she has been stricken sorely—both of her great Senators have gone. No wonder that the Mississippi heart is sad. No wonder that Mississippians gather tearfully about the biers of their great dead. No wonder that Mississippians, with all the greatness that they have in their living men, contemplating the illustrious past, may query who of them all shall rank with the great departed—who shall hold aloft the standard of Mississippi's glorious achievements as they that are dead used to hold it aloft?

Already in this House three of the distinguished sons of Mississippi have paid their eloquent and noble tributes to the memory of the dead Senator. The last utterance, I believe, in public of another great Senator of this great State was made in pronouncing a grand eulogy upon him who is now the subject of our remarks.

Most eloquent tribute also was paid by the worthy successor in the Senate of the great man whose death we deplore and upon whose virtues we comment this afternoon. Other Mississippians are to follow. I feel that they can speak upon this subject better than I can. I feel that their tributes will each be worth more than mine. These Mississippians have been heard and will be heard in the discharge of a duty to them more solemn, more glorious, than any that now can rest upon those of us who come from other and distant States.

It is a proud privilege to every one of them, prouder far than ours can be, to speak of the great Senator whom they and their constituents esteemed so highly. Proud, indeed, and thankful must every true son of Mississippi be for the privilege and opportunity of paying his tribute to the illustrious dead. We from distant States, from other parts of the Union, who learned to admire, to follow, to revere, the great Mississippian, simply join those from the State of his pride and love, join you, his friends, who knew him far better than we did and who must esteem him even more highly. We join gladly and yet sadly in these interesting ceremonies.

Always, I suppose, Mr. Speaker, when we contemplate death, we will, whether or no, peer if we can beyond the barrier of mists, into and through the dark that hangs about the river that all cross over when they leave us.

It seems to be an instinct of humanity to ask the question whether there is a life beyond this life, and to give it an affirmative answer. Much time has been devoted to the consideration of the old, old question, "If a man die, shall he live again?"

I shall not add anything. I can not add anything, to the discussion of that most interesting, that awful question which comes often in the lifetime of each; comes whenever the hand of death is laid upon a companion, a friend, a beloved one; whenever the country suffers the loss of one of its great defenders, one of its illustrious citizens. Surely there is something natural, something that we would not, can not, get rid of, in the hope that springs eternal in the human breast that beyond this life there must be another life; in the faith that the intellect which can grow and expand and develop, as did the intellect of our dead friend, must be something more enduring than the frail body that shelters it for a few short years; in the belief that the firmness of character, the integrity of purpose, the lofty ambition, correct and well guarded, the pure sentiments, the strong affections, which can control a noble life, ought to have fuller expansion and fuller fruition in another existence; that life is incomplete, that existence in large part is a failure, if there be not a life after this life is ended; if there be not a taking up of the life of the spirit, the soul life, the life of thought and of love, in another sphere, under more favorable circumstances, where there may be infinite expansion, infinite growth, through infinite years.

How pleasant, too, when indulging in these reflections, must be the picture in the minds of the hopeful of the reunion upon the other shore of these kindred spirits, parted for a brief time by what we call death; of this great Senator, so strong, so sturdy, so brave, so resolute, and his noble wife, from whom, if there be another life, he was separated for but a few weeks—taking up forever over there the reunited thread of life broken here. How glorious must be the progress through the boundless realms of eternity of ransomed souls so noble here, so pure there, after all the dross of earth has been left behind!

Whenever we are stricken, whenever death comes close to us, we put by all the philosophy that denies a future existence. We cling to the hope, and we evolve for ourselves out of revelation or reason a philosophy, which does give a life beyond the tomb; which gives relief to distress; which cheers us in times of greatest trial and affliction; and which, we trust, will crown existence for us one and all. To millions the hope of immortality is the only bridge that spans the gulf of despair.

So far as earthly immortality is concerned, we may not look to a time so distant, to a period so dark in the life of our nation—we may not contemplate a state of civilization so wrecked and broken—that the memory of this great and good man will not live; will not be loved and treasured.

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, eulogy has become so commonplace and has been so indiscriminately bestowed that it is often meaningless. The world has few great men and the world knows them. Their own lives are their greatest encomium. Their deeds live after them and by these are they judged. Magnificent mausoleums nor lofty panegyrics can give greatness to him who has not won it and who does not deserve it. Especially is it true in a republican government like this, where every man is judged by his services to his country, that there can be no counterfeit greatness. It is true that many strut across the stage of life surrounded by the glitter and glare of wealth, or the pomp and parade of accidental position, followed by fawning flatterers, but they soon make their exit and are forgotten.

The greatest man is not he who gets the greatest number of people to serve him, but he who serves the greatest number of people. I can not add to the greatness of JAMES Z. GEORGE by saying that he was great. That he had many of the elements of greatness is the verdict, not only of the great State to whose service he gave all his splendid abilities and powerful energies, but it is also the verdict of the American people, who knew him as the fearless champion of human rights as they were guaranteed by the Constitution of the fathers.

If achievement is a test of greatness, if to be a leader of men, if to understand and thoroughly master the science of free government, if to be able to grapple with the greatest problem of the age, involving the happiness and welfare of two races, and to have the brains and the courage to solve it in a manner that startled the conservatism of his friends and provoked the criticism of his political enemies, and yet in a manner satisfactory to both races; if to rise from poverty, and with no other aid except his own brain and energy win the proud position of being one of the first constitutional lawyers in the American Senate—if such achievements as these entitle him to be called great, he was a great man.

If it is admitted that he had faults, it is only to say he was human. There is nothing more proverbial than the frailty of human greatness. A great man, when asked the secret of his greatness, answered in one word, "Reserve." He concealed his weakness by the mask of reserve. But GEORGE despised all the artificial and adventitious aids to strengthen him in public opinion, and whatever faults he had were known of all men; in fact, he seemed to think the world was entitled to know them.

He perhaps neglected too much the amenities of life and had too little regard for its conventionalities; yet the great body of the American people, from whom he stood not aloof, and with whom he moved and lived without reserve, loved him best. It is frequently said that no man is great to his own valet; but the old body servant of Senator GEORGE, who, when emancipated, never left the old plantation, was next to his bier as one of the chief mourners at the funeral in the little church at Carrollton, and hundreds of ex-slaves who had known him from childhood followed him to his grave, sincerely appreciating and mourning the great loss which they, in common with their white neighbors, had sustained.

Those who knew GEORGE best wondered which to admire most, the simplicity of his greatness or the greatness of his simplicity. Without any of the graces of oratory, no public speaker had more influence with the people, to whom he expounded the most intricate political and social problems in the simplest and most unaffected way. Without parading himself as the patron of those he helped, he was a philanthropist; with none of the wiles of a demagogue, he was a sincere lover of the people; with none of the arts of the politician, he was a statesman; without the ostentatious self-righteousness and hypocritical cant of the Pharisee, he was a Christian.

Emerson has said, "He is great who is what he is from nature and never reminds us of others." GEORGE imitated no one; he was like no one.

He was an indefatigable worker. Dumas said he lost 5 francs every time he stopped writing to put on his boots, and Victor Hugo thought it was a waste of time to feel his own pulse. GEORGE's big brain was so stirred with restless energy and great thought that he had little time to cultivate graces of manner or personal adornment.

He was most fortunate in his birth; fortunate for himself and fortunate for his people. He was the child of poverty and toil, and knew none of the temptations of wealth or the enervating influences of luxury, yet he was richly endowed with brains, energy, physical and moral courage, and self-reliance. These were great riches indeed, and he invested his entire capital in self-improvement, and JIM GEORGE, the plowboy, became the great lawyer, judge, and statesman.

Born of the common people, he was of the common people and knew the common people, and while he was too great to yield to their demands when influenced by passion or prejudice, he was great enough to fully comprehend and appreciate their wants and to sympathize with them in their wants.

The greatest man is he who does the most to perpetuate free government and to secure for all the people, however humble, equal rights under the law. To enter into such a work against the aggressions of the rich and powerful one must be in sympathy with the needs of the people. To be in sympathy with them one must be one of them. Lincoln could not have been Lincoln if he had not been a rail splitter. Christ could not have been Christ if he had been born in a palace instead of in a manger, if he had been born a Pharisee instead of the carpenter's son.

If popular government is to be perpetuated, it will be done by men who spring from the plain people. While it may be well for organized capital and great commercial interests to be represented in national legislation, such a constituency always has commanded and always will command the services of the most talented, assiduous, and aggressive. But in order that government by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth, it is of the highest importance that the producers of wealth and the taxpayers be represented by men who at all times will cheerfully champion their rights and never yield to the temptations of place or power. Such a man was JAMES Z. GEORGE, and as such a grateful people will always honor and revere his memory.

Mr. LOVE. Mr. Speaker, he who comes last in a field which has been reaped of so much eloquence can only hope to glean among the already garnered sheaves.

We are here to pay tribute to the worth and greatness of a departed friend and colleague—to commemorate the life and services of the late Senator from Mississippi, Hon. J. Z. GEORGE, who, after a long life of usefulness and an illustrious career, on the 14th of August, passed away, and his noble spirit sunk to rest, down by the sounding sea, where the gentle breezes kiss the sighing pines at eventide and where the waves dash and break as they caress the silvery beach.

Neither praise nor censure can now reach him, but we can show our appreciation of his great and valuable services to our country, and keep alive and perpetuate his memory by burnishing his deeds bright in the minds and hearts of his countrymen.

Men attempt in various ways to perpetuate their memories. Some erect stately marble shafts that may portray them in grandeur to future generations, but this will only perpetuate their names, and the marble, too, will soon crumble and be swept into the sea of oblivion; but the monuments of great minds and the deeds of noble hearts will survive the wreck of matter and the shock of time. The only true life that lives after the personality has been destroyed is that which is written in the hearts and intelligence of the human race, for when we look back over the ages that have rolled by in the revolutions of time what have we left but the thoughts of men. So "we live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths." It is not how long we live, but how well.

The custom in antiquity was for political cabinets to take formal note of the death of those who were great only in their funeral panegyrics. Too long did the etiquette of courts prescribe hypocritical mourning. Nations should mourn only for their benefactors. The representatives of a people should recommend to their homage only the heroes of humanity. "An indiscriminate deluge of praise drowns mediocrity and greatness in one common grave, where there can be no distinction." The memorial orations and the monumental epitaphs spoken and written of our departed friends, expressive of our love, esteem, and appreciation, are often too long withheld. Kind words of approval and encouragement are of far more value to the living than to the dead.

It is gratifying to know, however, that the heart of our distinguished friend was thrilled and gladdened by paeans of praise while living. Though not without opposition and criticism, he was the recipient of the highest honors within the gift of a generous and grateful constituency, and his life was crowned with successful endeavor in achievements for his country.

Senator GEORGE was not possessed of personal vanity. He did not seek notoriety, rather preferring to be painted as he was, "and greatness is wise in wishing it." His ambition was to serve his country well, and the success of his people was his most coveted desire. He was a true, able, candid, courageous son of the South, faithful to her interest, to her convictions, to her traditions.

JAMES Z. GEORGE was born in Monroe County, Ga., October 20, 1826. His father dying in 1838, his mother moved to Noxubee County, Miss., in 1834, and two years later to Carroll County.

His school facilities were limited, but by hard study and extensive reading he acquired a fine English and fair classical education. At an early age he served in the Mexican war as a private in Jefferson Davis's famous regiment of Mississippi Rifles. He began the practice of law in 1847, and was elected State reporter of the supreme court of Mississippi in 1854. His ten volumes of reports are models of clear and accurate statements. He was a member of the secession convention in 1861, enlisted as a private in the Twentieth Mississippi Regiment, became lieutenant and captain, and was captured at Fort Donelson. He was afterwards commissioned brigadier-general of State troops in 1862, and colonel of the Fifth Mississippi Cavalry in 1863. He was again captured at Colliersville, Tenn., and remained a prisoner on Johnsons Island until the close of the war. He resumed the practice of law after the war, moving to Jackson, Miss., in 1873, where he codified and published, under great disadvantages, a Digest of the Supreme Court Decisions, a work rated among the best of its character, being extensively used by the profession in the State.

He afterwards formed a copartnership with Judge Wiley P. Harris, then the most noted lawyer in Mississippi. In 1875 he was chosen chairman of the Democratic State executive committee, planning and executing the most wonderful and successful political campaign ever waged in the State. It was in this campaign that I first knew him, and I was greatly impressed with his fine judgment and great executive ability. He at once became the Democratic leader, and was the guiding spirit of the civil revolution of that period. In 1879 he was appointed judge of the supreme court, and his associates conferred upon him a rare distinction by immediately choosing him chief justice. In this position he sustained the great reputation he had made as a practitioner. His judicial mind grasped the philosophy of jurisprudence, never being satisfied with a knowledge of law that did not include the reason for it. The law was his true element, and his intellectual force was that of analysis, in which he was especially gifted.

In 1881 he was elected by the legislature to the United States Senate, where he remained a prominent member until his death. His record as a legislator and statesman is equal to his career as a jurist. He served on leading committees charged with grave duties, but was always equal to the requirements of the position, acquitting himself with distinguished ability and with an integrity and fidelity questioned by none. His record is one of conspicuous merit, without a spot or blemish to mar its symmetry or cloud its horizon.

Whether discussing in committee or on the floor legal or constitutional principles or questions of public policy, he was recognized as one of the ablest men in the Senate. His strong minority report on the national inquest bill, his able speech in favor of the treaty with Great Britain, his exhaustive discussion of the race question, his powerful speech against the constitutionality of the Federal election bill were all masterpieces of logic and learning, and will compare favorably with the best speeches of Calhoun or Webster.

Perhaps the most important service rendered the State of Mississippi by our departed friend was in the constitutional convention of 1890. It was a high tribute to his statesmanship, and an evidence of popular trust, that he was called from the national capital to his home to assist in framing a constitution for his State.

It was my fortune to be associated with him in the performance of this difficult and laborious task, and it affords me pleasure to testify now to the faithfulness and efficiency of his master hand in contributing largely to the framing of a constitution that will ever be a monument to his genius.

The suffrage clause became afterwards the subject of criticism and attack in the Senate, on the ground that it was a violation of the Federal Constitution.

The reply of Senator GEORGE to these objections was so convincing and complete that all attacks were silenced. This was, in all probability, the effort of his life, for the question seriously involved the rights and interests of his own people, which to him was always paramount.

He was truly a friend of the common people. He made their cause his own, and sympathized with them in their joys and sorrows.

He was a practical agriculturist, having been raised on the farm, and was an extensive planter at the time of his death. The agricultural interest always had his deepest concern. He was active in the establishment of the Agricultural and Mechanical College in Mississippi, and its success was his pride. His letter to the Farmers' Alliance of Amite County was the ablest and most convincing argument ever written against the subtreasury. His famous speech in Mississippi on the silver question in 1895 was so full of information that it will go down to history as a revelation on that question.

As a lawyer he was the peer of any in the Senate—a legal gladiator. He possessed preeminently a legal intellect, great clearness of thought, accuracy of discrimination, soundness of judgment, and strength in debate—always clear in his grasp of a subject.

He trusted his cause on its merits and justice, and his weapons for success and supremacy were reason and argument. He possessed no blandishments or diplomacy.

Neither euphony nor rhythm found place in his speeches or writings. They were without embellishment in language or ornament of style. Beauty and brilliancy were lost in the substance of his argument and in the handling of facts. The sentimental and beautiful did not dominate his nature, nor did he dwell on imaginary things. He cared little for metaphysics and never attempted oratory, for the bent of his mind was logical, and reason rather than emotion held sway.

He was a dangerous antagonist, for he knew all the methods of attack and defense. He was fertile, original, and bold. He knew his capacity for work, which was unequalled, and did not undervalue his intellectual grasp and vigor, while his courage of heart equaled his capacity of brain.

He was a very practical man, and read such literature as he could turn to practical use. His was, indeed, a massive and splendid character. It stood out like a monumental stone, "not adorned by fretwork, but plain, clear, powerful, and ponderous as it rested on its imperturbable base."

He was not without faults, and, no doubt, at times his prejudice misguided his judgment, but no one ever doubted his sincerity.

He did not cultivate the social side of his nature, and cared nothing for conventionalities. He was always fond of his friends, however, and rejoiced in their presence. His courtesies were the natural promptings of generosity and goodness of heart, but notwithstanding his rugged nature he was a man of broad sympathies, profound convictions, and generous impulses. He was full of charity and gladdened many unfortunate lives by his generous aims; and, after all, the best fame is that which, though not sought, is won by goodness, charity, and brotherly love. They are the crowning beauty of our work in this world. The tear of gratitude shed by the distressed is a purer jewel than ever sparkled in the crown of political fame. Through all the weary months of his sickness and suffering the hearts of the people of Mississippi went out to him in sympathy and affection.

Let us in appreciation of his virtues emulate his example, and strive to so live that it can be said of us when the end comes that we left behind us a legacy of good deeds and of honorable achievements.

And now, in thine own native clime
Thou art at rest beneath the tomb,
Where brightest skies expand sublime
And choicest flowers forever bloom.

Mr. Speaker, at the request of the family of the deceased, I will ask to print as a part of my remarks the memorial address of Hon. W. M. Cox before the Mississippi legislature on January 18, 1898.

Death is never to be despised. His coming is at all times a thing to inspire interest and awe. But when the great and the good has been taken, when the leader and the benefactor of men has passed from his place "here on this bark and shoal of time" to the pale realms beyond, it should give us solemn pause, and persuade us to the serious contemplation of the life that has departed, that we may preserve and transmit the memory of its services and virtues, while we warm and ennoble our hearts with the sentiments of admiration, of gratitude, and of love.

He to whom we this night pay tribute of honor is worthy to receive it. This Commonwealth, rich though it has been in men of character and genius, has not produced a greater man. Mississippi has not had a more illustrious citizen, nor a patriot who served her with more unflinching zeal or purer purpose.

His life was for a half a century so blended with the history of the State that the one can not be rightly recounted without the other. Had not the spirit of boasting been alien to his nature, he might as he neared the end, looking back over the most momentous events in the history of his State and recalling its greatness and glory, have exclaimed with the hero of the Latin epic, "Quorum pars magna fui."

While still a youth he was one of the band of gallant spirits who illustrated Mississippi valor upon the fields of Mexico, and contributed so largely to the glory and success of Americans. Upon the cessation of hostilities he returned to his home and devoted himself to the mastery of that noble profession, the law. It is said that upon his admission to the bar, there were some who thought that a capital or driver was spoiled to make a poor lawyer. But these little understood what manner of man he was. They little knew the tremendous power of intense and sustained concentration of thought which resided in that massive brain. They did not appreciate the high ambition of that rough and uncultured youth, nor the force of that heroic determination which was destined to override all obstacles and place him among the foremost of the great men of his generation.

He rose rapidly to distinction in his profession. Ten years reporter for the supreme court, author of an elaborate digest of Mississippi decisions, two years justice of the supreme court. These are facts which attest his industry, as well as his legal learning and ability. He made some important contributions to the jurisprudence of the State, and these alone would have sufficed to win him a noble fame.

But he was not to be merely the lawyer and jurist. Though this profession afforded him a great field for arduous and successful labor, and though for him its rewards were splendid, yet its sphere was too narrow for the full display of his great and matured powers and its limitations too severe for the bent of his genius and the instinctive and irrepressible aspirations of his heart. The law for him was a great training school. It helped to fit him for the broader, if not higher, field of statesmanship. Nature and discipline combined to make of him a great democratic statesman, a true commoner, a real tribune of the people.

He was a member of that great convention which in 1861 boldly asserted the Southern view of the Federal Constitution as being but a compact between sovereign States, and which severed Mississippi's connection with the Federal Union. He counseled and voted for this action. Of the titanic struggle which followed, of the conduct of the war, I must not now speak further than to say that he whom we this night honor gave proof upon the field of the sincerity and strength of his convictions. But his military services, though highly creditable, were not specially distinguished; neither nature nor discipline had made of him a great soldier, but both nature and discipline united to make him a great civil leader.

And now the time was coming when his power of civil command, his faculty for organizing and leading great popular movements, his capacity for conservative and constructive statesmanship of the highest and boldest kind were to find ample field for their exercise.

Mississippi was in the dust, her ancient doctrine of State's rights discredited, flouted, and scorned. The institution of slavery, so woven into every part of her social fabric, had been torn up by the roots, and all the relations of the dominant and the servile race violently dislocated by the rude hand of foreign and vindictive power.

The intelligence and virtue of the State were under the ban of radical hate and proscription. A race of slaves, whose immediate ancestors had been gibbering savages and whose only fitness for civil freedom has been acquired in the school of slavery, were not only emancipated and invested with civil rights, but were made the dominant power in the State. Into their hands were committed the destiny of a great Commonwealth and the fortunes of an enlightened and magnanimous people. So wicked an experiment, so infamous an exercise of despotic power, had been without parallel in the history of civilized people. It was followed by a saturnalia of misrule, of profligate corruption, of confiscation under the guise of taxation, of debauchery, infamy, and shame, which has never been equaled unless in the days when degenerate Rome gave her provinces up to be plundered by the targeholders.

The fabric of this odious despotism was held together and kept in place by the full power of the Federal Government, animated and directed by the bitter hate of a victorious and malignant faction. But for this it would have been swept away as soon as established by the indignant wrath of an outraged people. That under these conditions the people of Mississippi restrained their rage, that their righteous indignation did not flame out into wild, irregular, and hopeless insurrection and revolt, that biding their time they bowed their necks to the yoke until the season should be ripe for their deliverance, is to my mind the noblest thing in their history and the best evidence of their greatness and fitness for self-government.

Mississippi has always been fortunate in the character of her public men. During the trying ordeal of Radical and negro domination she was blessed with a host of popular leaders whose wise counsel curbed the impatience of the people and prepared the way for an ultimate overthrow of alien despotism and the restoring of civilization and social order. Some of them are yet living, but many are with the dead. Would that the limits of this address would permit me to name them all, and to pay some tribute, however feeble, to their memory and fame. Mississippi should never forget them, and, if true to herself, she never will.

Of these great men and splendid patriots JAMES Z. GEORGE was for the work to be done recognized as facile princeps. He was hailed as the one of all best fitted by native and acquired wisdom, by single-hearted devotion to the public welfare, by innate capacity for organization, and by tremendous power of his great personality and the grim force of his dauntless will, to lead the white people of Mississippi in heroic struggle against desperate odds for the rescue of their civilization and the rehabilitation of their institutions.

A great work was to be done. A mighty deliverance was to be wrought out. A revolution was to be accomplished—but it was to be without the mustering of hosts or the clash of arms. It must be under the guise of law, and sanctioned at every stage by outward compliance with its forms.

General GEORGE, as chairman of the Democratic executive committee, became the recognized leader of the white people of the State in this great movement. That it succeeded beyond the expectation of even the most sanguine is due largely to his industry and patient attention to details, to the thorough organization of the forces at his command, to his wise leadership, and the inspiration of his dauntless courage and invincible will.

As one of the later results of this great political revolution, General GEORGE was elected to the United States Senate to succeed Blanche K. Bruce. He was the colleague of Mr. Lamar, and, upon his elevation to the Supreme Court, of General Walthall. During this eventful period no State was more worthily represented than was Mississippi in that august body.

The world might safely be challenged to produce three jurists and statesmen of more splendid ability, loftier character, or purer fame. They had no thought but their country's good, and no ambition but to win the gratitude and love of their people; no faintest whisper of suspicion was ever breathed against their integrity, and calumny found them clothed in complete armor, the armor of simple truth and honesty. They commanded and the survivor of them continues to command the admiration and confidence of their fellow-Senators and of the whole American people.

By their character and services they contributed in a great degree to the bringing of the two late warring sections each to a better understanding of the character and purposes of the other, to the allaying of bitter sectional animosities, to the restoring of the Federal Constitution, and the building anew of the Federal Union. It was in no small measure through the influence of these three men that the cause which the South lost upon the field was regained in Senate and forum, and that the once despised but now ascendant doctrine of State rights has been more fully secured by judicial decision and general acceptance than ever before the great struggle made by the South for its assertion and vindication. It is no longer the mere shibboleth of a political party, but is fast coming to be recognized by all thinking men as the only safeguard against imperial centralization and its inevitable concomitant, despotism.

But the most splendid service of General GEORGE to the people of Mississippi was rendered during the latter years of his life. Though radicalism had been overthrown and driven from the State, it left behind a constitution which stood as a constant menace to white supremacy and Anglo-Saxon civilization. The facts and the theory of our civil life were in hopeless conflict. The organic law and the actual conditions were in pronounced and growing antagonism. We had conserved as best we could the fruits of a great revolution by ignoring and evading the law, by force, by fraud, by such other means as dire necessity compelled us to use.

But this could not go on forever. Our civil life was threatened with general corruption and our people with universal debauchery. Factions were springing up which portended the division of the white people into hostile camps with the negro in the background as the future umpire of their differences. The best and wisest citizens of the State were sick at heart over present conditions and fearful for the future.

The need for a new constitution was manifest to all. But it was doubted by many if, under the limitations of the Federal Constitution, the ignorant mass of the negroes could be disfranchised; while it was feared by all that if the experiment when made should prove a failure, it would leave us in a worse condition than before. But something was required to be done, and done at once. The thought was in every mind, "If it were done when 't is done, then 't were well it were done quickly."

The time called for a leader whose wisdom, courage, and devotion would inspire universal confidence and command the support of the whole people, and he was found in Senator GEORGE. He threw the weight of his great influence in favor of a constitutional convention and thereby secured its call. It is no disparagement to the other members of that great body, when assembled, to say that he was easily first in fitness for the work and first in the confidence and expectation of the people. The constitution met his approval, and it is generally agreed that the provisions regulating suffrage were formulated by him. I have not the time nor is this the occasion for a discussion of its merits. But it has accomplished its purpose. It has given us security with honor. It has freed Mississippi from the fetters which held her down, and now the future lies bright and alluring before her. No greater, indeed no other equal work has been done in Mississippi, and the part taken in it by Senator GEORGE has won him the increasing gratitude and affection of the people of this State.

But the new constitution was not to go unchallenged. It was assailed in high places as revolutionary in its purposes and methods, and as subversive of those amendments to the Federal Constitution designed to secure to the negro his rights as a citizen. It was the good fortune of Mississippi that she had in Senator GEORGE a man eminently qualified to maintain her part in this discussion. In the great debate in the United States Senate, in which the constitution of Mississippi was so bitterly assailed from so many quarters, Senator GEORGE vindicated it with such wealth of learning and such power of logic and eloquence that his adversaries were covered with defeat and confusion. Since that debate it is all but universally conceded that the constitution of Mississippi has successfully evaded the limitations of the Federal Constitution and is safe from the interference of Federal power. It is destined to be a model to all those States of the South and Southwest whose social conditions resemble our own.

The character of Senator GEORGE can best be drawn in a few strong, bold lines. He was a big-brained, big-hearted, strong-willed man, who was indifferent about the mere conventions of life and sometimes careless even of its amenities. He was transparently honest and without a trace of cant, phariseism, hypocrisy. He loved his family, his friends, his people, with a strong and unflinching devotion. He was sublime in his allegiance to convictions and principles, and absolutely without fear in the discharge of his duty. He seems to have taken as the rule of his life Woolsey's advice to Cromwell, "Be just and fear not. Let all the ends thou aimest at be thy country's, thy God's, and truth's." There was a wealth of tenderness about him little suspected by the casual observer.

I am told by one who knew him well, whose privilege it was to visit him during the last months of his life, that it was wondrously moving to see the gentleness, the solicitude, the marvelous tenderness with which this big-brained, big-hearted man, with the lionine head and thunderous voice, though himself smitten with death, ministered to his aged and invalid wife. They had trod the path of this mortal life together, and now together, with unabated love and devotion, they waited for the end.

And now, in the name of the people of Mississippi, I proclaim that—

"He was a man, take him for all in all,
I shall not look upon his like again."

And he is gone. In the plenitude of his fame he has passed away. Like ripened grain he has fallen before the reaper. We deplore his loss. But our grief is not unmingled with joy. His work is done. His past is secure. No defraction can ever dim the glory of his life. His future is in the hands of Him who is able to do for His saints exceedingly abundantly above all that we can ask or think, or are in anywise worthy to receive.

He believed in God and in Jesus Christ, His Son. He stayed all his hope of eternal life upon the word of Him who hung upon the tree; and such a hope can never be disappointed.

Patriot, hero, sage, saint of the Most High! we bid thee hail! hail! and farewell!

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, it is a time-honored custom of this body to pay tribute to the character and services of the distinguished dead of either House. Responding to this, and prompted by a sense of duty to my State as well as respect for the late Senator GEORGE, I shall in an humble way here record my estimate of his life and services to the country.

J. Z. GEORGE was born in Monroe County, Ga., on the 20th day of October, 1826; he removed to Mississippi in 1834; he died at Mississippi City, on the Gulf coast, on the 14th day of August, 1897, and was interred in the cemetery at Carrollton, his home, on the 17th day of August, 1897, in the seventy-first year of his age.

For some time he had been an invalid, and though somewhat prepared for the worst, the news of his death fell like a pall upon the people of his State and the country, for it was felt that a great man had fallen—great as a citizen, great as a lawyer, great as a Senator of the United States. As a citizen he faithfully served his State; as a lawyer he reached the highest judicial station in Mississippi's gift; as a Senator, by his ability, learning, and devotion to duty, he has made his impress upon the statutes of his country. Mississippi mourns his death; the Senate has lost one of its strongest and brainiest members, and the Government one of its ablest and staunchest supporters.

When but a youth he served his country in the Mexican war as a private in the First Mississippi Rifles, commanded by Col. Jefferson Davis. In 1861, having been a member of the secession convention, and having voted to sever the ties that bound his State to the Union, he early afterwards enlisted in defense of that which he believed to be right. He entered the army as a captain of a company in the Twentieth Mississippi Regiment of Infantry, but was soon made colonel of the Fifth Mississippi Cavalry Regiment. In a charge on the Federals, Colonel GEORGE was captured and carried a prisoner to Johnson's Island, where he remained until the end of the war.

Returning to his home at Carrollton, Miss., he at once set about repairing his wasted fortunes and encouraging his people to submit to the new order of things, until in those dark days of reconstruction, when their rights were ruthlessly trampled upon by those in place and power, he, as chairman of the Democratic executive committee of the State, by his cool head and strong guiding arm, a veritable Moses, led them out of the wilderness of gloom and despair. He restrained the young and impetuous of our people, while he spoke words of cheer and encouragement to the old and despondent, and finally by lawful methods rid the State of carpetbag rule. Verily, he was to his people in those days as—

A pillar of cloud by day,
And a pillar of fire by night.

In 1870 General GEORGE was appointed by the governor one of the supreme judges of his State, and was soon thereafter made chief justice. As chief justice of a very learned court he easily sustained his reputation as an able and painstaking lawyer and won the admiration of bench and bar as a jurist.

In 1881 Judge GEORGE was elected by the legislature of his State to the United States Senate, in which body he served continuously until his death.

While a member of the Senate in 1890, his State having ordered a constitutional convention, Senator GEORGE was called home by his people to assist in framing a new constitution, as a delegate from the State at large, and his services, especially on the franchise committee, are gratefully remembered by the State. His genius for construction is indelibly impressed upon that instrument, and its practical workings and crucial tests have demonstrated his judgment and foresight.

Mississippi owes much to Senator GEORGE and recognizes the obligation. His able defense of the constitution he had helped to frame, when attacked on the floor of the Senate on his return, was grand, exhaustive, and convincing. It is a tribute to him that a few days ago the Supreme Court of the United States sustained this constitution. From an humble beginning, overcoming the adversities of fortune, Senator GEORGE, by his "self-consciousness," his indomitable energy, and untiring research, backed by his great strength of character, forged his way to the front rank and made for himself a name that will stand in the future pre-eminent among America's greatest jurists and statesmen.

He was recognized as the constitutional lawyer of the Senate; this was accorded him by political friend and foe alike. Duty to him was as a Divine command; and whether as chairman of the executive committee of his party, guiding it through the troublous breakers of reconstruction; on the supreme bench of his State, grappling with great legal questions; in the constitutional convention, laboring as a member of the franchise committee; on the floor of the Senate, discussing affairs of State; on the hustings, instructing his people, or in the private walks of life duty to him was paramount to any other consideration.

In his private life Senator GEORGE was unostentatious and charitable. Plain in his dress, often blunt in his speech, his kindness to the poor, and particularly to his old comrades in arms, was proverbial.

At his home, where he had wrought out his fortune and laid the foundation for his future usefulness, he was loved and revered.

Never can I forget the immense concourse of friends who gathered to pay a last sad tribute of respect on the occasion of his interment. Rich and poor, high and low, all showed unfeigned sorrow at his untimely death. Carrollton that day was literally in mourning; truly did it seem that the Angel of Death, hovering over the city, had touched the lintel of every home.

Greater tribute than this hath no man, that "after life's fitful dream is o'er," "after the battle has been fought and won," he is returned to his home, and there, amid the genuine sorrow and tears of friends and neighbors, is laid to rest in the generous bosom of that State which he loved so well and served so faithfully.

[Mr. STALLINGS addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, I desire unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, and also in the memorial volume that will be published afterwards, the funeral oration of Dr. John L. Johnson, delivered in the Baptist Church at Carrollton, Miss., on the occasion of the burial of Senator GEORGE. I want to say that it was the finest analysis of the character of Senator GEORGE that could possibly be written.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAY of New York). The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a certain paper which has been mentioned. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The memorial address of Dr. Johnson is as follows:

Memorial discourse delivered in the Baptist Church at Carrollton, Miss., August 17, 1897, by Dr. John L. Johnson, upon the occasion of the burial of Senator James Z. George.

Job v, 26: "Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season."

I. The occasion: Mississippi buries to-day her great citizen. Perhaps if I had said "her greatest citizen" no heart here or elsewhere would protest against the distinction thus implied. Many of us, we fain would believe, love the State as fervently, as passionately, as he did, but to few of us has been accorded the power and the privilege of serving her as effectively as he served her.

To-day her people everywhere are mourning because he is dead. Her State officials are here to do him honor. His neighbors and friends are here, weeping for him. His church is here, heavy with sorrow. His family—children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren—are here, sorely bereaved. The National Government is here, testifying through its honorable Senators and Representatives to his great worth and great service. The land he loved has opened her bosom, and presently will receive him to rest upon her heart; and he shall sleep calmly and long, pavilioned in her answering love.

Surely the occasion is worthy of more than there is to offer now. No man who properly appreciates it would attempt to meet its demands at the instant. And for me, it is no affectation of modesty to say that, with all the time I could wish, I could not hope to do justice to the character of the great statesman. Some day, at the National Capitol, his colleagues, after due preparation, will take his measure and speak of him at his worth. And yet, when this has been most fittingly done, nothing of it all would be sweeter to him than the tender love we bring him to-day. Let us linger together, then, a little, communing in our sorrow and thinking on him whose death stirs so deeply both us and all the people.

II. The man: We bury a man to-day, one upon whom the century may think and proudly say, "He was a man." We are not here to lay our wreaths upon the still heart of an infant with undeveloped possibilities, about which men may speculate. We come not together to lament the untimely fate of youth and the blight of promises that gladdened many hearts. The storm has not come and wrenched from its stem the swelling bud or the bursting bloom; nay, the flower, blown to its full, having given to the world all its beauty and fragrance, is silently loosed from its stalk and fallen to the earth in the calm of the evening sun. We mourn a man who has come to his grave "in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season." From 1836 to 1897 was a long life. The ear was full, the grain ripe, and all was ready for the garner.

As we contemplate such a life we think of a statue, magnificent in dimensions, complete in outline, perfect in proportions, with every feature full, presenting small ground for criticism, speaking everywhere of greatness, and leaving little for those who gaze upon it but to admire. What were the elements of that splendid manhood, whose career and example are now the possession forever of our community and State and nation, and whose life story will be a perpetual adornment of American history? What are the energies that vitalize one's being and concur to uplift and sustain and constrain and impel him to the fulfillment of a course which stamps him with the seal of greatness?

I do not presume to speak by authority on a subject as difficult as this, but you will, I am sure, be patient with me. In the twilight of yesterday evening, soon after it was definitely decided that I should undertake the service I am now endeavoring to perform, I began to ask myself the very questions I have just propounded to you. As I meditated upon the qualities that make men great, it seemed to me that the secret of his power was not hard to find. The dynamics of success, by which I mean those elements of his character which vitalized and energized and compelled him to a great career, were chiefly these three, which, concurring in any man, must needs lift him high above the ordinary.

1. First of all was his self-consciousness. By this term I do not mean vanity, but rather do I mean something which differs from it as a full head differs from an empty one. Rather do I mean by it honesty with one's self, honesty with God in the recognition of gifts divinely bestowed, and in the manly resolve to invest them all. Now, here was a man upon whom God bestowed ten full talents. You know to-day that this is true, and you have known it for many a day. He, too, knew it; knew it before any of you, and far better than any of you; and this knowledge gave to him power that nothing else could have given. Without this consciousness, greatness comes not to any man. You, young friends here to-day, ponder the truth of my words and make an inventory of your own gifts. Perhaps in it you will hear a call to undertakings such as you have never yet meditated upon. It was the recognition of the lavish hand of God that stirred the brain of our honored dead, fired his heart and infused his blood with the iron of an energy that carried him resistlessly forward.

Does the conception seem to you to be unjust? To know God and to know one's self, these are the sum of knowledge for us. "Acquaint thyself with God" is the very pith of Revelation, and the profoundest exhortation that ever came from brain of man came in the two words, "Know thyself." How shall one know himself without taking account of what God has done for him? The merchant who knows his business takes at least once a year an inventory of his stock and counts his reserve capital. Is it vanity to do so? By no means; for only thus can he insure the proper relation between his business and his ability; and if he is wise he will be very honest with himself as to his ability. Even so ought every man to deal with himself. Can he do so honestly and yet be taken by surprise at his own resources?

I am aware that this view is in conflict with that sickly modesty which inspires its possessors to both falsehood and hypocrisy; which affects to parade its poverty of intellectual power before the public, and in the next breath has the effrontery to ask for office whose efficient incumbency demands the possession of consummate ability. Greatness in its virgin, uncorrupted character knows nothing of modesty like this. It is honest and it is ingenuous; it neither boasts itself publicly nor thinks it well to deny unto men the conscious possession of God's richest gifts. Even such was the quality in him of whom we speak.

2. His power of will: Underneath or along with this self-consciousness, this recognition of endowment by nature, lay an unconquerable will—a will whose temper was fired and energized by obstacles. Obstacles there were, obstacles all the way; but over them all he went, even as the untamed steed, which, fixing its eyes upon the distant goal, clears its path over ditches and dikes and attains to the freedom of its inheritance among the prairies. Better, perhaps, it would be to say, his was the iron will under whose command his life advanced to its successes, even as a mailed and manopled battalion moves steadily forward, peril proof, to the heights upon which it will plant its victorious standard.

3. Another element of success in Senator George was what I may call his "vision of opportunity." The echo tells of a voice and certain material conditions: the ax tells of forests, of timber, of houses, of homes, of fireside comforts, and luxuries. Even so does the consciousness of power tell of its objects and of the avenues to them. When those avenues did not open freely of themselves, that consciousness, supported by his will, was the inspiration which pointed out and forced the way. It was thus that he came to take his place with the great men of his day. Conscious of extraordinary ability, girded and guided by an inflexible will, covering the times with the eye of a sentinel, he came to his fame as to a thing expected. Once it was written of a man that "he awoke in the morning to find himself famous." Never greater libel was uttered against him whom another called

"The Pilgrim of Eternity, whose fame
Over his living head like heaven is bent."

Never false word was spoken of anyone. The fame that comes while men sleep deserts them in their waking hours. It is not a hidden thing that loves to play the wanton with slanting looks from liquid eyes. Nay; it covets to behold the ample brow and the imperious gaze, and to hear the empire of the voice in tones of command. It loves to bend the knee and worship before him who goes armed with these powers, and it will not do reverence to any who has them not.

To the man who is conscious of great abilities and honest in his recognition of them as the gifts of God; who beholds in these gifts a high and inalienable commission, and feels in his heart a manly resolve to discharge it to the full; who, under the propulsion of an imperial will, watches ever for the gateways to opportunity and seizes upon them with a master's stern hand; to such a man fame gladly does obeisance and then goes forth with cheery, tripping gait and the charm of mellow voice to herald his way. Even thus, not captured while he slumbered, not taken by surprise, did the great Commander of Mississippi come to his fame.

III. His spheres of life: If there were time, I should love to show how in all the walks and spheres of life he went forth as a man girded by this triple power, self-consciousness, energy of will, foresight of opportunity. Next to the worship of God is the admiring contemplation of a man.

1. As a soldier, in his youth he went to the Mexican war, following as a private the flag and fortune of Jefferson Davis's regiment. When the clouds of war had settled over this fair land and hung dark and heavy, so long that the drumbeat of the long roll was not sufficient to drown the cries, North and South, of bereaved hearts—Rachel weeping for her children and refusing to be comforted because they were not—General GEORGE was all the while either in a Federal prison or ready to form the battle line.

As a conscious leader of men he went out in the beginning at the head of a company from Carroll County, and to the end of life his career was that of a leader. For a while he was brigadier-general of State troops, and later he became colonel of the Fifth Mississippi Cavalry. It was while in command of this regiment that he was captured by Federal troops and taken to Johnson's Island, where he lingered until the close of the war.

2. As a citizen his career was more distinguished than as a soldier. He was greater in peace than in war. He did not begin his career in poverty, as has been said of him so often, but in circumstances which counseled economy, while he gave himself to the study of his chosen profession.

At the age of 20 his disabilities were removed and he was admitted to the bar. He was appointed engrossing clerk of the State senate, and afterwards reporter of the supreme court of Mississippi. He was a member of the convention which passed the ordinance of secession and gave his voice for that act. In 1879 he was appointed a member of the supreme court, in which, by the action of his colleagues, he was at once preferred to the chief place. In 1880 he was elected to the United States Senate, and on the following year he took his seat at Washington and held it until his death. In 1890 he was called by the State to take part in the constitutional convention, and as a member of that body his service to the people is beyond estimate.

As soon as his own footing in Mississippi became sure, he began to study her needs. He was a friend of every right interest of the State and sought to prosper himself only by seeking prosperity for the State. He believed in popular education, and was actively instrumental in founding our Agricultural and Mechanical College as a school for the sons of Mississippi's yeomanry. His devotion to her people and to all the interests of her people was indeed a beautiful thing. This devotion was often put to the test, but never so strongly before as in 1891, when what he characterized as "the delusion about the subtreasury" took possession of the popular mind and threatened to change the political complexion of the State. Oblivious of his personal interests, scorning to hold his high place by holding his peace, he faced the issue squarely by meeting the people all over the State and discussing the question before them. His logic was irresistible and his triumph complete. Some of his utterances were framed in a pathos so contagious that nothing could withstand them, and men love to repeat them yet. Here is one:

"Public life has no charm for me beyond the consciousness of having at all times, to the best of my humble ability, worked for the welfare and advancement of the people of Mississippi and of the whole country. I shall not, therefore, compromise my principles, nor advocate what I know will injure the people, for the poor privilege of occupying a conspicuous place among those who have aided in destroying what I have always endeavored to preserve and advance—the welfare of my countrymen."

But chief among his high qualities as a citizen was his friendship and care for the poor. They have been all about him in his life, and it has been his delight to make life cheerful to them. They are here to-day, self-confessed recipients of his benefactions, thanking God for the life that sowed charities among them, mourning that now his hand is still. They are not all here; but benedictions fall upon him from those who needed and were helped by him, in numbers such that his great heart would beat with answering blessing, if only he could hear them yet. The mother, aged now and bent, whose boy in '61 went forth to flash his bayonet or flesh his maiden sword and fall on the battlefield; the widow, whose husband came not back from that sad strife to partnership of care for his children; the gray-haired soldier who went and came back, wearing now perforce the color which then he wore of choice, and halting still from wounds he courted then; children of these and the children of peace who inherited, at once, peace and poverty; all these, if they came within his power, felt the charity of his heart in the help of his hand.

Was he great at the bar, on the bench, in the National Council? You say so. But not greatest. A man gets very near to God when he gets near to the poor. The profoundest depth that ever yet was measured by human foot is when that foot is pressed upon the poor man's heart. The loftiest height that ever yet was scaled on earth is when one stoops to lift his brother's prostrate form and bid him look up and hope. Wordsworth tells us that—

"Trailing clouds of glory, do we come from God."

There are heights above that for him who bends to the poor, and as he does so, he shall be pavilioned in an unearthly glory; and upon him, even as he bends, shall be the image of God. Skeptics there are, I grant you, and for many reasons. But upon this picture the strong man and the rich, giving his strength and riches to lift up and bless the poor, his heart going along with his work and his wealth—upon this picture has never skeptic looked yet and, looking, doubted the divine truth of those words, "God created man in His own image."

3. Lastly, let me speak of the great man as a Christian. For many years he had been a professor of religion. During the war he had humbled himself before God and sought His guidance. When he came home from prison after the war, he sought and received baptism at the hands of Rev. Henry Pittman. Subsequently, but not until after he had taken his seat in the United States Senate, he formally connected himself with this church, then under the pastorate of Rev. L. S. Foster. Since that time he has invested the membership with an increasing love, and his interest in the church has steadily grown. This building is largely the result of his concern to see his own people creditably domiciled, and his contributions to its erection were liberal.

But I will not wrong him to-day by concealing from you his deep regret in later years that he had not given greater emphasis to his Christian life and walk. As, at the evening hour, he meditated upon what he had done in life's long day, and what still needed doing, it came to him as a sad reflection that less now had needed to be done, if he had done more. And yet, poor as he felt this feature of his life to be, it was his very best. He saw God and honored Him; he humbled his heart before the bowed head on Calvary; and believing, he entered into life. This brings us the solidest comfort to-day.

We are glad for his greatness; glad for the great heart that lavished its benefactions on the poor; glad for the honors with which his fellow-citizens burdened him, and we are glad for the love in which they now enshrine him. But gladdest of all are we for this, that coming now to his grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in in its season, he comes also to a crown which no man can take from him and to "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away."

Let us go now and bury him—the soldier, the citizen, the Christian.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I now move the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3034) granting a pension to Eliza A. Keeler, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 371) donating a condemned cannon to the Thirty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to report it without amendment, and submit a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why is the joint resolution reported when we have a general law which authorizes the Secretary of War to do that?

Mr. HAWLEY. Not for the Grand Army of the Republic. This is the national annual convention. It has been customary to give them an old gun out of which to make medals.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

RETIRED OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire, by instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs, to report an original bill in relation to retired officers. I will state that the provisions of the bill passed the Senate some time ago, but were not concurred in in conference committee.

The bill (S. 4677) to provide for the employment of retired officers of the United States Army in time of war was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in time of war retired officers of the Army not above the grade of colonel may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be employed on active duty, other than in the command of troops, and when so employed shall receive the full pay and allowances of their grades.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why is it limited to colonels and those below that rank?

Mr. SEWELL. On the general idea that those ranking above colonel are too old for service. At the present time there are a number of officers, two or three hundred, detailed from the Regular Army, where their services are absolutely necessary, whose positions can be filled by gentlemen from the retired list just as well, and allow them to go into the field. The committee was unanimously of opinion that it was a proper thing to do.

Mr. COCKRELL. This includes colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors?

Mr. SEWELL. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. Let the provision of the bill in that respect be read again.

The bill was again read.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Provided, That the increase of hospital stewards under this act shall not exceed 100.

Mr. SEWELL. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

HOUSE OF MEETING.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures.

[Mr. WHITE addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, yesterday when the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] who has the bill in charge proposed that we should come to a vote this week, I objected. I did not object because I desired delay, but because I felt that the bill should be thoroughly discussed, and because I felt that it was an important bill and that it needed the careful attention of the Senate. Without meaning any reflection upon any other body or departing from the established rules of the Senate, I will say that it is very apparent that the bill has received little or no attention so far from any other legislative body and will receive little or none unless it receives it at the hands of the Senate.

I am not in physical condition to make a speech, and but for the fact that the Senator who has the bill in charge seems to be impatient at what seems to me to be natural delay, I should not, feeling as I do, ask the attention of the Senate. I shall endeavor to discuss this question as I think it becomes a member of this body to discuss it. I do not regard it as having any relation, except incidentally, to the great monetary question which has been dividing the country, and that is to some extent a subject of general interest. I shall not attempt to discuss the question from a partisan standpoint, for if I know myself I do not desire in the present condition of things to intrude politics or partisan prejudices or in any wise to say or do that which shall particularly inure to the benefit of any political organization.

I regard a revenue bill as an important measure. It touches all the interests of the American people, and upon a wise system of revenue depends our ability to carry on a war, when there is necessity for it, to maintain a proper condition amongst the people, to foster and protect and not destroy the great interests on which the prosperity of the country is based. I should be ashamed of myself if at such a time, with a war rife, I should forget myself and take any position on any question here presented which I would not take at any other time, or if I should attempt in any way either to injure the dominant party or to build up a party that I believe is essential and necessary to the preservation of the liberties of the American people and upon which depends largely, in my judgment, the prosperity of the American people.

Mr. President, we are in a war. I am not going into the question whether it is a wise war or not. There is one thing which everybody must admit, and that is that the American people, without reference to party or section, have had a lively sympathy with the struggling people of Cuba for many years. For a generation we have seen the people of that unhappy island contending for that which we assert in our form of government is the right of all people under the sun—the right to govern themselves, the right to direct the form of government which they shall have. And this struggle, as well as the preceding one of many years duration, which has passed away within our memory, has been one that has challenged the sympathies of the American people, and there has been a general feeling that, so far as was consistent with our obligations as a neutral nation, we should assist the struggling Cubans.

Mr. President, we could assist the people of Cuba with every propriety and not violate any of the laws of neutrality that are binding upon us. Whether we have or whether we have not is not now a subject for discussion. We have now determined that so far as the power of the United States can be exerted it shall be exerted in their favor. We have also declared, with great unanimity, that these people are entitled to be free and entitled to establish a government of their own, and that all we seek in this war is to give them that opportunity and to aid them in so doing.

I am one of those who believe that we might have escaped war, and I am one of those—and I am not ashamed to say it—who, to the very last moment, hoped that we might avoid what I think is not a national blessing, but a national curse—a war. I do not mean to say that some good may not grow out of the war; I do not mean to say now that my judgment was infallible about escaping war and accomplishing what the American people desire—the freedom of Cuba. I may have been in error. Those who were charged with the exercise of governmental power did not agree with me. So now we are brought face to face with a foreign war for the first time in the memory of the present generation. Of course I know we had a war in 1812, but that has practically passed beyond the recollection of the American people. We are now contending not with a great power, not with one of the rich and wealthy nations of the world, but with a worn-out, effete, and decaying nation, and yet we find ourselves in a position of unpreparedness, in an unsatisfactory condition, and we find necessary delays and obstructions which ought not to exist.

This war will be carried on because the American people are back of it. It will be carried to a successful issue, and, as I said yesterday, the Administration will find itself supported by every class of people in the United States, irrespective of their party affiliations. If we do not agree with all the policies of the Administration, even in the conduct of the war, there will be no holding back of the sinews of war; there will be no disposition on the part of anybody in the United States to refrain from giving to the Government all the money that it desires and at the time it desires it, and all the men the Administration says it wants, and at the time and in the way it wants them.

We have already 200,000 men, practically, in the field. I understand from the public press that yesterday the President called for 75,000 more. This will give, I believe, in round numbers, an army of 280,000. What the war will cost, nobody can say. When it will end, nobody is prepared to guess. If no complications arise, I think we have a right to suppose it will not be one of long duration.

When this war began we had in the Treasury of the United States $225,000,000 in money, in round numbers, every dollar of which had been received from the sale of bonds; or, in other words, within the last few years—since 1893, when the Cleveland Administration came into power—we have run behind in our revenues, we have increased our expenditures, and bonds were sold and the proceeds put into the Treasury for a sum considerably exceeding that of the money I have mentioned. We are fighting this war now upon credit, and it is gravely proposed that we shall continue to fight it on credit.

I am one of those who believe that every generation should bear its due proportion of the necessary expense that may be incurred in the maintenance of American honor and of American integrity. If this were a war for the maintenance of our existence, as was the war of 1812 and the war of 1861, there would be great propriety in doing as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] said he wanted to do—distribute its burdens over the coming time. But we voluntarily assume to ourselves the championship of these oppressed people. We do it for two purposes. The first is because it is consistent with our ideas of righteousness and justice, because of our sympathy with those who struggle to be free; and we do it on another account, that it saves us the annoyance and gets rid of a troublesome feature on our border. If the war is of such magnitude that it will be an undue burden upon this generation, then I think very likely and very properly we should extend some portion of its burdens on the coming years. I doubt myself whether we have a right to engage in an enterprise of this kind and then saddle the cost upon the next generation.

Of course I am not insensible to the fact that the proposition is to issue bonds and pay them in ten years. But there is nobody here who supposes they will be paid in ten years. There is nobody here who supposes that those who suggest it expect that they will be paid in ten years. There is nobody in the country who supposes that we will attempt to pay the bonds in ten years. We certainly shall not attempt to pay them in ten years unless there is a revolution in the political affairs of the country that will put in power people with different notions as to the desirability of getting in debt from those entertained by the powers we have now. I assume that if we issue bonds they will be an obligation that will last for many years. Nobody on this floor has yet been willing to declare that he was for putting all the burden of this war on somebody else, that is, upon another generation or upon years to come. I suppose nobody will.

The House of Representatives, where these bills must originate, sent us a revenue bill with the bond feature attached. I need not say that the bond feature has no earthly connection with the revenue question. It is entirely independent of it, and we are as well qualified, constitutionally and otherwise, to initiate legislation for bond issues as is the House of Representatives. But it was known that in this body there were a great many Senators who have decided objection to the increase of the public debt. It was known also that under no condition save that of war was it possible to pass through this body a bill authorizing the creation of a greater bonded public debt than now exists. So the House of Representatives attached to the bill, not because it is cognate or related to it, but because it was supposed that the two things could be passed together, a revenue collection of about $100,000,000 at the most and the creation of $600,000,000 of interest-bearing debts.

Mr. President, the courtesies of the two bodies prohibit me from expressing my opinion as I should perhaps be willing to do if on the public stump. I simply want to say that in the history of this country there never has been such an attempt before. The bill came to us from the House, where it was very briefly considered, and the moment it reached this body and went to the committee there came from certain sections of the country a decided clamor for immediate action on the part of the Senate. A bill which they said was to take $100,000,000 out of the people in the form of taxes, that was to load us down with a debt of $600,000,000 more at a time when our revenues were not sufficient to pay our ordinary expenditures—for they had not been during the year, although they might have been through a few months of the year—it was insisted by the active supporters of the bill, or more particularly the active supporters of the borrowing part of the bill, we should at once, in response to the House, take up and pass, because it was labeled a war measure.

Some of the public press went so far as to say that every man who opposed the bond issue was assisting the Spaniards and encouraging opposition to the Government of the United States in that country. I saw Senators who do not believe in a bonded debt characterized the other day as the "assistant Spaniards."

Mr. SPOONER. As what?

Mr. TELLER. As assistant Spaniards. It was done by one of the great public papers that support the party to which the Senator from Wisconsin belongs. I have no objection to stating the newspaper—I do not know that I quote the words exactly, but it was the New York Tribune.

Now, I want to repeat what I said yesterday. The Government of the United States is to have all the money it wants. It is to have all the support, financial and moral, that it wants in this country. It is to have it from us who do not believe in creating a public debt unless there is an absolute necessity. But it is not going to take away from the Senate of the United States its right to pass upon the methods of raising revenue when the bill comes to us from the House.

We were unfortunate, perhaps, in the committee. A majority of the committee was not in entire accord with the Administration, and yet we find the minority of the committee in charge of the bill, properly so, in my judgment, with my acquiescence at least. The minority of the committee insist, through the Senator who sits in front of me [Mr. ALLISON], as I understood him, that about all the money that we need collect is what the House has provided. The Senator from Iowa then went on to make a general statement as to what would be the result if the bill should pass as it had passed the House of Representatives, and what would be the result if it should pass as it came from the committee, with the increased taxation provided by a majority of the committee.

I believe all the members of the committee have been heard on the floor except perhaps two members of the committee who have not yet addressed the Senate on the subject. There may be three, but I think most of the Senators on the committee have addressed the Senate. I will venture to say, with no disrespect to the committee and no intention to unduly criticize the committee or any member of it, that in the whole history of revenue bills there has never been such an exhibition as there has been on this bill.

The House of Representatives, where the bill originated, where it must be supposed to have had some attention on the part of the committee, declared that at the most $100,000,000 was all that the bill could raise, and in an itemized statement of what was to be realized the amount was fixed at $90,000,000, although the chairman of the House committee in making the report says the bill "will in the aggregate yield from $90,000,000 to $100,000,000 of additional annual revenue, distributed as follows." Then he distributes it. Two million dollars of that was very promptly, as I understand, eliminated from the bill by the vote of every member of the Senate committee. I do not think it is improper to make this statement, because that is not a question, as I understand, of dispute in the Senate. That was the tonnage tax.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It was unanimous.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I had some curiosity, and I have yet, to know upon what principle, upon what theory, upon what idea, the House of Representatives proposed at this time to put a tax of $2,000,000 on the tonnage of ships entering American ports. If there is anybody anywhere who does not know that that was a tax upon exports in principle, although perhaps not in the sense that it was unconstitutional, but if there is anybody who does not know that that tax would have been a tax upon the export of every American product, it seems to me he has never considered this matter at all. Yet that provision came here and was included as one of the items of the bill that this clamor for immediate action would insist upon our accepting.

Then the Senate committee also struck off an item of $5,000,000, which action I understand was equally unanimous. That was a special tax of $4.80 per annum upon dealers in tobacco and cigars, which amounted to $5,000,000. The aggregate of this itemized statement of the chairman of the House committee is $90,000,000 of revenue that the bill was to supply. Seven million dollars of that has been taken out by the Senate committee, which leaves $83,000,000, according to the House statement.

Now, upon that we might have gone to work with some idea that the committee had deliberately prepared its statement and that it did represent what the bill would very likely raise. But when the acting chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, the Senator who has this bill in charge, tells us, as I understood him, that the bill as it came from the House would raise from $115,000,000 to $120,000,000, I do think we were entitled to an itemized account as to how the Senator expected to get it. When the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] rises here, as he did day before yesterday, and tells us the same thing, we are still left in the dark, with no possible means of determining where the error is in the computation of the House.

Mr. President, that is certainly unusual. There never has been such a proceeding in the Senate before. I do not believe there ever was a revenue bill which came to this body before that did not come accompanied with careful estimates from the Committee on Finance as to what would be the amount raised. I can recall none.

In my judgment the Senator from Iowa who sits in front of me and the Senator from Connecticut have simply indulged in the Yankee privilege of guessing. When challenged, as they both were, to state what the items were, they still dealt in generalities.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think it possible in time of war to estimate as accurately the probable expenditures of the Government as can be done in time of peace?

Mr. TELLER. I am not talking about the expenditures of the Government. I am talking about the revenues of the Government. We have the estimate of the authorities as to the expenditures. I am not yet criticizing that. I do not know that I shall do so.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will pardon me, does not the fact that we are engaged in war have something to do with the revenues? Is not that calculated to change the status?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator did not ask me about the revenues. He asked me about the expenditures. If he wants to know whether I think it is more difficult to estimate the revenues in time of war than in peace, I promptly answer him that I do.

Mr. SPOONER. But what I mean to ask is whether estimates for revenue made in time of peace are not very likely to be changed by a change of status from peace to war?

Mr. TELLER. Why, Mr. President, always so. But this estimate, if you can call it an estimate, was made in time of war. It was made after we had declared that there was war existing between us and Spain. To determine just how much revenue we want, I admit, there is some difficulty, but there is no more difficulty than we meet in other cases. We could take into consideration, when we got an estimate from the committee, that it was made at a time when it might be somewhat difficult to make it. Yet I think we are entitled to an estimate notwithstanding the difficulties that surround the case.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. In the observations I made to the Senate some days ago in explanation of the bill I did not make a detailed statement of every item in the bill. I did undertake to say what I believed it would raise as it came to us from the House. The Senator now criticizes the committee because it did not take up the bill item by item and give an exact calculation of what the detailed revenues would be. I submit to the Senator, as no one has had more experience in these matters or better opportunity to make estimates and guesses than he has, it is impossible for us to state with anything more than approximate accuracy how much will be raised from the bill.

We can state with almost absolute accuracy what will be raised from malt liquors, as we can state with almost absolute accuracy what will be raised from the various forms of tobacco, because all experience has shown that the tobacco taxes with varying rates yield substantially the same revenue as compared with the population. As to the beer tax, I stated, at least if I did not state, I thought, that the estimate in the House of Representatives was too low, and I will now put my opinion against the opinion of that committee that the beer tax is estimated at $2,000,000 less than it ought to be.

Mr. TURPIE. You mean the House committee?

Mr. ALLISON. I mean the House committee.

Mr. TELLER. In other words, you put it at $35,000,000 instead of $33,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. The beer tax and the tobacco tax together.

Mr. TELLER. Oh!

Mr. ALLISON. I think the beer tax as estimated by the House is too small; but the two uncertain elements in the bill are Schedule A and Schedule B. Who can tell, except approximately, how much the stamp tax on checks will yield? When we had the stamp tax upon checks, we had deposits in the banks to the amount of about $1,500,000,000. Now the deposits amount to $6,000,000,000. I can estimate the check-stamp tax at $8,000,000 or $10,000,000, but it is only an approximate estimate; and yet I believe it will be between the two figures. If you estimate that single item, you will have as a result of it from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 from Schedule A. As the bill came to us from the House Schedule B itself would probably amount to $20,000,000 or $25,000,000.

It was in this general way that I ventured to state that in my belief the estimates of the House of Representatives were too small, and yet it may turn out that my estimate is inaccurate. But where will we get the data, I ask the Senator from Colorado, to know how many checks will be drawn upon the basis of a deposit in the banks of the United States of $6,000,000,000? Where will we get the data to ascertain the amount on the thousands of articles that have entered into consumption during the last twenty years, and that have not been subjected to the criticism of the reports of our taxgatherers? The other day I asked an intelligent man from the city of Chicago how much the daily sales of grain upon their public exchange amounted to. He could not tell me. I asked him where I could get that information. He said, "It is not in existence; there is no report to be found of the daily transactions of the Chicago Stock Exchange." I asked him how much he thought it would be. He was one of the dealers. He said it would be anywhere from fifty to one hundred million bushels.

If in the bill as it came from the House a stamp is required upon those transactions, although it is somewhat obscure, and yet it was intended to put a stamp upon those transactions as well as upon the transactions of the Stock Exchange of New York—

Mr. TELLER. Oh, Mr. President—

Mr. ALLISON. I do not want to disturb the Senator, but I am only trying to show how difficult it is to make more than an approximate estimate, because the accurate data is not found in the reports of the boards of exchange or in the reports of the stock exchanges. Yet the Senator tells me that I should put down to a thousand or ten thousand or a million dollars the amount of money that will be raised from Schedules A and B. I can only say, as the Senator could say, that in my belief it will be far in excess of any estimate that has been made thus far in this transaction.

Mr. TELLER. That is a pretty long question.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not rise to ask a question. I asked the privilege of answering the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. All right. The Senator has practically admitted now that he was guessing when he made the statement that the bill as passed by the House did not provide revenue enough.

Mr. ALLISON. I said so.

Mr. TELLER. And he guessed that with these amendments the amount would be $37,000,000 above the House bill. He might just as well have guessed $50,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, if the Senator takes no account of the stamp tax—

Mr. TELLER. I have not taken any account of the stamp tax yet.

Mr. ALLISON. My estimate was not $37,000,000 above the House estimate. I made no such estimate as that.

Mr. TELLER. Practically that.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I said the House estimate was too low, that I believed it would be $105,000,000, and that it might reach $110,000,000.

Mr. TELLER. You said $120,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. No.

Mr. TELLER. I understood the Senator to say $120,000,000, and I understood the Senator from Connecticut to make substantially the same statement.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not read my observations after they were made, and I have not looked at them in the RECORD.

Mr. TELLER. The point is not very material whether the Senator came within six or seven million dollars in his guess or within $20,000,000. What I wanted to show was that it was a guess on his part, that when he said the House had underrated the amount that the bill would yield he guessed at it. I have as much right to suppose that the House was correct as he had to ask us to suppose that he was correct as to the revenue that the bill would yield.

Mr. President, it is not always necessary to guess. As to some taxes you can tell very nearly what they will produce. At least, the Senator went through the whole bill, more or less, suggesting what each paragraph ought to produce, without giving us any statistics, without giving us any numbers, or anything of the kind.

The majority of the committee propose some new measures of revenue, and that is what I want to address myself to very briefly now. I refer especially to the features antagonized by the Administration members of the committee. They assume that there is no necessity for them and that the House bill is going to raise enough, or at least all the revenues we ought to put upon the people of the country at this time.

We have not had a very satisfactory discussion of this question, I admit, on the part of the committee. We have the statement in one breath that the bill will raise revenue enough, as much as we ought to raise by taxation, and in the next that it does not raise enough to carry on the Government, and that we ought to have a great bonded debt.

Mr. President, I am like the Senator from California. After listening to everything that has been said by members of the committee who sustain the House report, I fail to find anything that the committee are willing to put the tax on. They materially modify and change the provision regarding stamps. I do not know that I am going to criticize that, for of all the burdens, of all the taxes that have been collected since I have been acquainted with national taxation, I think the stamp tax is most offensive. I recall that during the war we had a very burdensome stamp tax, and that it was got rid of very early as one of the most objectionable features of the entire revenue system that was forced upon the people of the country during the war.

Whatever may be said about the income tax, I aver here that the income tax was never as unpopular with the American people as the stamp tax. I do not know that I need go into any very extensive argument to show why that was the case. A small portion of the American people were affected by the income tax, while every class of men, high and low, rich and poor, were inconvenienced by the stamp tax. It was not so much the expense as it was the irritation that accompanied the stamp tax. People did not object to the payment of 2 cents on a receipt, but a man taking a receipt distant from towns where stamps were kept, not having provided himself with stamps, took the chances of prosecution under the law for the omission and of having his receipt invalidated in a court of justice when he wanted to use it. Unless a man who wanted to make a check secured checks with the stamps already on them, he found himself in a condition where he could not comply with the provision of the law, and the result was great complaint.

I am not going to object that the committee have modified somewhat the stamp act. I do not know whether that provision received the approval of all the committee or not. I do not know now whether it is right or not. I wish for myself that you could eliminate the stamp provision. I shall vote for it, if the committee insist that it is necessary to raise revenue, just as I am going to vote for other things that I should like to have eliminated, if I could, because I know when you come to raise money you have got to put it on something. I do not belong to the class of legislators I have heard of who voted for all appropriations and voted against all taxes. I know if you have appropriations you must have taxes, and the best laid tax is that which is distributed all over and makes every man do something toward the maintenance of the Government of the United States.

I am myself opposed to taxes that are not universal. I have no sympathy with the suggestion that the $1,800,000,000 in the savings banks of this country should bear no share of the public burdens. I believe accumulations, great and small, should bear their share. Neither do I sympathize with those who say that the State must reserve to itself certain lines of revenue and that the Government of the United States must be excluded from that source. The time would come, if that were true, when the National Government would be compelled to rely upon import duties, or, what is now the suggestion, upon borrowing money to conduct the affairs of the Government.

The State may tax its corporations, it may tax incomes, as is done in many of the States, or in some of them, at least, or incomes from certain kinds of business, but the State must lay its taxes with the understanding that the National Government is superior and has taxing power over everything that is not excluded by the very terms of the Constitution from touching. State taxes on such lines must be subordinated always to the tax of the National Government. Otherwise, in an emergency, the States might render it utterly impossible for the General Government to secure the means for carrying on a great war, such a war as we carried on from 1861 to 1865, when we taxed everything in this country which was taxable, when we hunted with extraordinary industry for articles upon which to put the hand of the General Government in the way of taxes.

Mr. President, we then had internal-revenue stamp taxes from which no man in this country escaped. There was not a man or a woman or a child in the United States who did not feel the influence of the tax. There was no man so poor, if he ate or drank, that he did not pay a proportion of that national tax, and when the war closed we were raising three hundred and some odd million dollars of revenue from internal taxation.

It was said here yesterday the same kind of taxation now would bring an immensely larger sum of money into the Treasury of the United States. I have no doubt the people are better able now to pay a thousand million dollars than they were to pay $300,000,000 during the civil war. They are double in population, and, more than that, you must take into consideration that one-third of our population at that time was practically deprived of all its property and was left in a state of absolute destitution, except so far as the ownership of land was concerned.

It is objected to this bill that a tax is put on corporations. We put a tax on corporations during the civil war, and also on individuals. I am one of those who would be glad to see this bill amended so that there would not be imposed a tax on corporations alone. I would tax every individual who produces as well as every corporation; I would put a slight tax on production, but I would modify to some extent, if I could, the tax upon consumption. The most onerous tax that a man pays is that upon consumption. He may decline to produce if he does not think he can produce with profit, but he must consume. When you put a tax upon the necessities of life, such as he must eat, he must pay it. I will not go into details. I have the original act of 1862 and the act of 1864, imposing internal taxes upon the people of the United States. Then every man who bought a pound of coffee, and had it ground before he bought it, paid 3 cents a pound upon that ground coffee to the Government of the United States.

If he bought a pound of pepper, or any one of a hundred other things which enter into a man's daily food, he paid a tax. The people of the United States paid that tax without grumbling and without complaint until the war was over. Then they went to work and got rid of those taxes as well as they could, but not wisely in many instances, because Congress took off some taxes which ought not to have been taken off, and kept some taxes on which ought not to have been kept on. The American people to-day will pay $200,000,000 of internal-revenue taxes in addition to what they are paying if those taxes are righteously and properly laid. The American people are not a complaining people when it comes to paying taxes. They pay them readily. All they want to know is that they are just and equitable, and that no man pays more than his neighbor pays according to his means and according to the protection that is afforded him.

An absolutely just distribution of taxes, I admit, can not be made. You can not conceive of a tax which will not bear heavily on some, but you can make it as nearly just as possible by distributing it all over the country on all articles and on all the people alike.

The tax on beer is an onerous and burdensome tax, though I am in favor of it, because beer is one of those articles on which everybody seems to think you can collect the tax, and because you can collect it with less friction, perhaps, than almost any other; yet there are a hundred other articles just as taxable in justice and right as is beer.

Mr. President, the tax on corporations would suit me very much better if the principle was extended to individuals as well, and if I have an opportunity to vote for such an amendment as that I think I shall vote in that way before we get through; but if we can not do that, then I am in favor of the present provision in the bill as inserted by the majority of the committee. I know that it will work hardships upon some, but all taxes are burdensome. All taxes bear occasionally upon the people with great weight. That can not be helped, but I believe justice would be done if less tax was collected from tobacco and beer and more was imposed on a hundred other things that could be named.

If the committee had got to work and gone at it and established a system of revenue, which I think they ought to have done, which would last for years to come, I think they could have waived some of the very extraordinary tax on tobacco and have put it upon articles of luxury. Of course I know that tobacco is not one of the necessities of life, and I have not very much sympathy with its use myself, not using it myself; yet I know that, like beer, it has become almost an absolute necessity to a great many people in this country. Tobacco may be an evil, and yet it is in general use, and I have no doubt it affords great comfort and consolation to some men who have few of the comforts and blessings that ought to be vouchsafed to all the American people.

INCOME TAX.

I would not put all taxes upon the poor. I would put them upon the rich if I could. If I had my way, I would put taxes upon salaries; I would include every member of this body; I would include every man who gets his pay from the United States Government, except those who are protected by the Constitution of the United States from the imposition of a tax of that kind. I should feel a great deal better when I voted for this bill if I knew that out of the salary which the Government of the United States pays to me I had to pay a tax to the Government.

I could face the men who are complaining of burdensome taxes with a great deal better conscience if I could say that the members of the Senate of the United States, of the House of Representatives, and all the officials of the Government who are not protected by the Constitution are bearing this burden with you; but when a man tells me, as men are telling me, "I am the owner of a proprietary medicine, out of the sale of which I have difficulty in keeping my family, and you are putting a burden upon me which will drive me out of business," I feel that the tax ought to be less than we propose to impose. Perhaps it could be made less if we would extend this tax to all industries, to all salaries, and to all the incomes, as we did during the civil war.

Mr. President, I know it is said we are precluded from taxing the wealth of the country because of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the income-tax cases. In some respects that is true. We are greatly embarrassed by the decision of the Supreme Court, a decision that I do not care to speak of except in terms of respect, although I will admit that it was a shock to me when the Supreme Court of the United States made it. I had been myself familiar with the decisions of the court on the question of direct and indirect tax made during the last hundred years, and I had examined them again and again.

I knew the question of direct taxes had been settled more than a hundred years before that time; that there had been four cases following it; that in the first case there sat three members of the constitutional convention, who ought to have known what was meant by direct taxes; and that in each of the five cases which had been adjudicated there had never been a dissenting opinion. I supposed, if it were possible that the meaning of a law could be established by precedent, that that had been done.

As a lawyer, I anticipated no possibility of the court taking away from the Government of the United States the great power in an hour of emergency of calling upon the wealth of the country to come to its relief. There had been no decision since the court was established which struck such a fatal blow to the Government of the United States as did that decision.

I shall not speak in terms of disrespect of the court or of its decision. My education, my training, and my life work combine to give me a high opinion of courts. But, Mr. President, courts are liable to make mistakes; and the question which occurs to me again and again is, Were all the five courts, with their forty-odd judges, mistaken, or were the four judges right who united in making the last decision as to the income tax?

Mr. President, I have no doubt the time will come when the American people will find themselves in need of this power; and when that time does come, I have no doubt that public opinion, which is sometimes strong in this country, will demand either an amendment of the Constitution, or will demand from the court a change of opinion. When I say this, I do not enter upon any debatable or doubtful ground; and it is no disrespect to the court to say that it may change its opinion, for the court has done so once.

Mr. LODGE. I simply want to ask the Senator this question: The court having held that the income tax was a direct tax, what is the objection to laying an income tax as a direct tax in the manner prescribed by the Constitution?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator knows very well that a tax laid in the manner in which direct taxes are laid is the most unfair tax that can be laid, and that it will never be resorted to except in a very great emergency.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will allow me, it would defeat the very object of an income tax. If you lay an income tax according to population, you would not tax people according to their incomes at all.

Mr. TELLER. I was going to say that. Such a method would take taxes from the poor and the rich alike. The theory of an income tax is that the wealth of the country should bear the burden which it would otherwise escape.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely. I understand the object, of course, is to reach the wealth of the country, and that a direct tax would be imposed according to the population of the different States, and paid by the States. Would it not?

Mr. TELLER. Yes; if the States saw fit to pay the tax, but otherwise the Government would have to collect it.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. During the last war, when we laid a direct tax, some of the States paid the tax and some of them did not; but I do not think the Government attempted to collect the tax except where the States paid.

Mr. BERRY. Oh, yes; it did.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; the Government collected the tax.

Mr. TELLER. I think it did collect the tax in some of the Southern States.

Mr. LODGE. In portions of the Southern States the Government collected the tax.

Mr. TELLER. I think that is so.

Mr. LODGE. But if we levy a direct tax it will be paid by the States.

Mr. TELLER. Not exactly. The States might decline to pay it. Mr. LODGE. The States might decline, and then the Government of the United States itself would have to collect it.

Mr. TELLER. If the States declined to pay the tax, the Government would have to proceed to collect it; but, as stated by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], the very purpose of an income tax is to reach the wealth of the country. Is that objectionable? I know that it will be said by some to be objectionable; but it is not objectionable, in my judgment. I could fortify myself here, if I chose to take the time of the Senate—which I hardly feel inclined to do—by reading at length from the Congressional Globe, which I have at my desk, the utterances of some of the most prominent Republicans in the United States, made in 1870 and 1871, as to the righteous character of an income tax.

There never has been but one income tax in the United States in the proper sense of the term and that was the income tax of 1862, with the modifications and amplifications that followed it. I had occasion not long since to call the attention of the Senate to some of the facts in connection with that income tax, and I will venture to call its attention now to the fact that when that income tax was before the Senate in 1870, after we had collected a large amount, almost $350,000,000 under it, there was a proposition to repeal it and a proposition to extend it, one being in 1870 and the other in 1871, and there were very prominent men in the Republican party who took part in the defense of that income tax.

I have not brought here and did not intend to trouble the Senate with giving the views of the opposition at that time of those who were in favor of the repeal of the tax, but I simply want briefly to call the attention of the Senate to some of the facts in connection with the enactment of the tax in 1870 and the attempt to repeal it in 1871.

On June 3, 1870, Mr. Potter, in the House of Representatives, moved to insert at the end of section 85 the following proviso:

Provided, That the tax imposed by this section shall not continue or be collected after the expiration of the year 1870.

This was an amendment to the revenue bill, which was then in charge of Mr. Robert C. Schenck, of the State of Ohio, who was chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and Mr. Potter was a Democrat from the State of New York.

On the adoption of the amendment the yeas were 76 and the nays were 106. Among the negative votes were those of Mr. ALLISON, now a member of the Senate; Mr. HALE, now a member of the Senate; Mr. HOAR, now a member of the Senate; Mr. CULLOM, now a member of the Senate; Mr. Schenck, who had the bill in charge; Mr. Hawley, of Illinois, who was a prominent Republican, and was afterward Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, but is now dead, a man of great character and ability; and Mr. McCrary, of Iowa, who was afterward Secretary of War and a circuit judge, and who was a leading national Republican, I may say, in those days. If any Senator has the curiosity to examine the matter, he will find it recorded in the Congressional Globe, part 5, second session Forty-first Congress, page 4064.

On June 3, 1870, Mr. McCarthy moved to strike out all the section of the bill in relation to an income tax, which was to abolish the tax. On that motion the yeas were 60 and the nays 124. Among the nays were ALLISON, CULLOM, HALE, DAWES, HOAR, and SCHENCK. I have not attempted to add the names of the other Republicans, of which there were a great number, because I do not wish to make this statement too voluminous.

A motion was made to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Schenck, and the vote was—yeas 118, nays 68. Among the yeas on this motion were CULLOM, HALE, HOAR, and SCHENCK.

On the passage of the bill the yeas were 153 and the nays 35. That was a vote for an income tax; and an income tax which included, as did, I believe, the income tax of 1862, a tax on national bonds. I find amongst the names of those who voted in the affirmative for the passage of the bill the honorable Senator who sits in front of me [Mr. ALLISON], the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], a former Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Dawes, the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and Mr. Schenck, who had the bill in charge. I will say that, as a rule, it will be seen—because there were only 35 nays—the Republicans rallied to the support of the bill.

When the bill came to the Senate, Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, who was then the chairman of the Committee on Finance, stated on the 22d of June, 1870, that the income tax would yield about $30,000,000 a year. The old law had yielded $38,512,834. His speech will be found in the Appendix to the Congressional Globe of that year. I will deal with that a moment later.

I do not see the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in his seat, but I have no reason to suppose that he will regard it as at all objectionable if I read from the remarks he made on that bill. He was then a member of the House of Representatives. The Senator from Maine moved to amend the motion of Mr. Hawley, of Illinois, who had moved an exemption of $2,500, by substituting "$2,000" in place of "$2,500," and Mr. HALE then said:

The class who will pay this tax will be those who are not only above want, but above the pinch of anything besides fancied necessity. If we adopt this exemption of $2,000, I see no wit in reducing the rate from 5 per cent to 3 per cent.

That was the question.

As a rule, the incomes above this amount are received by men who either have a certain and assured income, putting them above the necessity of a narrow rule of living, or by those who from trade or business derive large profits, enabling them to live luxuriously. Let us cut off the tax, if at all, at its lower stages and retain it on the higher.—Congressional Globe, second session Forty-first Congress, page 4027, part 5, June 2, 1870.

That is the correct principle, Mr. President. The wealth of the country should contribute to the support of the country. I do not read this to charge the Senator from Maine with any inconsistency, but simply to show that conservative Republican members of the House of Representatives were not opposing an income tax five years after the war closed; and yet I have heard it charged on this floor that every man who favored an income tax was attempting to despoil the rich; that he was in sentiment, at least, an anarchist.

Among the very prominent members of the House at that time was Mr. McCrary, of Iowa, of whom I spoke a moment ago, who subsequently became a member of the Cabinet of President Hayes, and afterwards a United States circuit judge.

Mr. WHITE. He was also a Republican member of the Electoral Commission, was he not?

Mr. TELLER. He became afterwards circuit judge, and was a very prominent, influential, and able man. He was, as stated, a member of the Electoral Commission, and, I believe, voted in favor of seating Mr. Hayes.

Mr. WHITE. That is my recollection.

Mr. TELLER. I want to read very briefly from the remarks of Mr. McCrary, who made quite a lengthy speech. I shall only read slight extracts. He said:

Mr. Speaker, there is another consideration which, to my mind, is entirely conclusive against the abolition of the income tax. It is the only mode by which a large part of the wealth of this country can be taxed at all. I call the attention of the House to the fact that a large portion of the wealth of this country, as every gentleman knows, is invested in bonds of the United States. Every gentleman knows that those bonds are not taxed, either by national, State, or municipal authority. The only mode by which this part of the wealth of the country can be called upon to contribute anything toward the support of the national or State governments of this country is by means of the tax on income. It is provided in the law under which most of those bonds were issued that they shall not be taxed by national, State, or municipal authorities, and it has been decided by the Supreme Court that they are exempt from taxation. Abolish the income tax and the man who has his fortune in these bonds will continue to receive his interest and contribute nothing to the support of government, either State or national.

Mr. President, I imagine now a suggestion made in this Chamber to tax national bonds would receive from certain Senators here the greatest condemnation; and yet the original income-tax law, passed by the Republicans, and which was maintained for a long time, did tax incomes from national bonds.

On June 2, 1870, Mr. Garfield, of Ohio, said:

I move to amend section 85 of this bill, so that it will read as follows—

I wish to state that that was the income-tax section—

"And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied and collected annually a tax of 5 per cent upon the gains, profits, and income of every person residing in the United States, and of every citizen of the United States residing abroad, derived from any source hereinafter described, whether within or without the United States, except as hereafter provided, and a like tax annually upon the gains, profits, and income derived from rents of real estate within the United States owned by any person residing without the United States and not a citizen thereof."

He said:

The effect of this amendment, with two slight amendments in the next section, will be to abolish all that portion of the income tax which relates to business—the making of money by engaging in work—so that if my proposition be adopted, the whole weight of the income tax will fall upon realized wealth.

Mr. President, that would be anarchy of the worst sort, if it should be enunciated here to-day. If anybody should say here that he wanted an income tax to fall upon realized wealth he would be severely criticised at least.

I desire, by the amendment, to remove the burden of this income tax from labor, that it may rest exclusively upon capital. The amendment will continue the income tax upon interest, rents, dividends, all profits arising from corporations. In short, whenever any man terminates his active career in life and becomes a mere capitalist, living upon the profits of his wealth invested in some permanent form, that man's income will pay a tax. But wherever a man enters into a business, wherever he is a producer of wealth, wherever by his labor he makes use of his capital to increase the wealth of the nation, then he is to be exempted from the income tax.

That bill came to the Senate. It is worth while for some of my Republican friends to take up the debate and go through it—those of them who were not then in public life. If they will do that we will never hear from them the castigations we have heard upon those of us who, as Republicans, supported the income tax in 1894.

Senator Morton said when the bill was before the Senate:

If the wealth is in the hands of the few there is where the tax should come from because they have got it.—Congressional Globe, Forty-first Congress, third session, part 1, page 630.

Mr. Morton was one of the great war governors of this country, one of the strong men I have met in public life, one of the men of great intellect, a great lawyer as well as a great statesman.

On the 25th of July, 1871, when another bill was before the Senate—not this one, but a bill for the repeal of the former act—Mr. Sherman, after expressing great regret in taking the time of the Senate, said:

But my own conviction is so clear that its repeal is now wrong, both in policy and justice, that it becomes my imperative duty to state the facts and reasons fully and clearly upon which the opinion is founded.

He proceeded at length to discuss the justice and righteousness of an income tax. That speech may be found in the Appendix to the proceedings of the third session of the Forty-first Congress, page 58. It is well worth perusal. That was in the days when the Senator from Ohio was at his best, when it seems to me he was a little closer to the American people or the great mass of them than he has been for some years past.

I see before me the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], and I find that he voted against the repeal. While not expressing very much love for the bill, he said he preferred that method of raising revenue to some other. He said:

I am not frightened by the bugaboo conjured up at the last moment about the unconstitutionality of the tax, etc. * * * There are some other taxes which I should be prepared to surrender as soon as, if not before, I should be willing to surrender the income tax.

Senator Howell, who then represented the State of Iowa and who was a Republican, also took part in the debate. I will not stop to read what he said, except simply to say that he opposed the repeal. Senator Tipton, of Nebraska, took an active part in the debate and opposed the repeal. Senator Cragin, who died recently, a Senator of high character from the State of New Hampshire, opposed the repeal in quite an extensive speech. Among other things, he offered in the Senate resolutions against the repeal of the income tax, passed by the Republican convention of New Hampshire. I will read them. I do not see either of the Republican Senators from that State present, but these are the resolutions which Mr. Cragin presented to the Senate as voicing the sentiment of the Republicans of the State, and both of the Senators from that State voted against the repeal:

Resolved, That all laws imposing unnecessary or unequal burdens, by taxation or otherwise, upon the whole or any portion of the community, thereby diminishing or wholly depriving them of that compensation, leisure, and opportunity for development and happiness which their industry and devotion to duty fairly entitle them to enjoy, are unjust and oppressive and should be immediately repealed.

Resolved, That all laws which favor capital at the expense of labor and offer a bounty to accumulated wealth at the expense of productive industry are inconsistent with the principles of democratic republicanism, and we hereby repudiate and denounce them as in direct conflict with the purposes and aims of the Republican party.

Resolved, That the wealth of the nation should pay its debt, and hence we are opposed to abolishing the income tax or taxes upon the luxuries that wealth only can afford, while we favor the reduction of all taxes upon the necessities of life.

These resolutions passed the State convention of New Hampshire on the 5th of January, 1871.

I wish to submit another speech which the Senator from Ohio, Mr. Sherman, made in 1870. It was on the passage of the bill as it came from the House continuing the income tax, to which I have referred as being supported by some of the Senators who were then members of the House. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] was not present, I think, when I made the statement that I found as to voting his name, and that of the Senator from Iowa, and the Senator from Maine.

Mr. CULLOM. I am in favor of an income tax yet.

Mr. TELLER. I am glad to hear it. I did not assume that the Senator was not. I was not reading this to convict anybody of inconsistency, but to support the proposition I make that it is consistent with sound political equity and justice to have an income tax, and that we who support it are not because of that to be charged with being disregardful of the interests of the public or with being anarchists or anything of that character.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I was just inquiring whether there was any prospect of a joint resolution being reported at this session proposing an amendment to the Constitution enabling Congress to provide for an income tax.

Mr. COCKRELL. There was one here.

Mr. TELLER. There was one here.

Mr. CULLOM. There is one before the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TELLER. There was one offered here. I do not know whether it got the support of the Senator from Illinois. I do not remember.

Mr. COCKRELL. There was one offered and voted down.

Mr. TELLER. It had my support. I do not know about the others.

Mr. SPOONER. If my friend will allow me, I will state that there is an amendment of that kind pending before the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TELLER. I know there is, and I am very much in favor of reporting it if we should have another meeting this session, which I very much doubt. We have not had one for a good while.

Mr. Sherman said:

But, sir, there never was so just a tax levied as the income tax. Why? What is the theory of it? The income tax is simply an assessment upon a man according to his ability to pay—according to his annual gains. What tax could be more just in theory? You say it is difficult in practice, and so is any tax; so are all personal taxes. There is no objection that can be urged against the income tax that I can not point to in every tax and say, "Here the same objection can be made."

But there is another thing in a popular government like ours which Senators should not forget. They have heard the clamor raised about our ears by the newspapers and by men whose incomes are large; but when you come down to the solid basis of even-handed justice, you will find that writers on political economy, as well as our own sentiments of what is just and right, teach us that a man ought to pay taxes according to his income and in no other way. Property is not a proper test of taxes; because, as I said before, the property of the poor may be levied upon to make up the deficiency in the property of the rich. Unproductive property that yields no rent and no income may be compelled to pay the same rate of taxation as property which yields an annual rental of from 10 to 15 per cent. But the income tax levies upon all alike according to their income. It may operate unjustly in some special cases; but with a proper exemption and proper guards, there is no injustice in an income tax which does not apply to any other tax that can be levied in any form whatever.

Why, sir, the income tax is the only one that tends to equalize these burdens between the rich and the poor.

Even in England, which is the representative of property, where the House of Commons is composed almost exclusively of wealthy men, they have been compelled by the force of public opinion to maintain their income tax year in and year out since Sir Robert Peel proposed to react it—and no administration in that country has been strong enough to propose to do what the honorable Senator from New York now proposes to do here—entirely abrogate the tax on incomes.—Congressional Globe, part 5, Forty-first Congress, second session, pages 4714 and 4715, June 22, 1870.

It is so nearly 2 o'clock that I will suspend at this point, there being a special order for that hour. I have not concluded my remarks, however.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR WALTHALL.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I submit the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. EDWARD C. WALTHALL, late a Senator from the State of Mississippi, and that as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That at the conclusion of these ceremonies the Senate stands adjourned.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, twice within a twelvemonth death has taken from the Senate two illustrious sons of Mississippi; within eight years four great men from that Commonwealth who were famous in this Chamber have passed away, Davis, Lamar, George, and WALTHALL, names not to be forgotten, but ever potent to evoke respect, admiration, and affection. To-day the Senate suspends its usual business to speak in eulogy of the latest mourned of these renowned statesmen.

EDWARD CARY WALTHALL was a native of Richmond, Va., born April 4, 1831, of an old and honorable family. While a boy his father moved to Holly Springs, Miss., where he received an education in an academy at that time celebrated. He began early the reading of law and commenced the practice at the age of 21, at Coffeeville, Miss.

Four years afterwards he was elected district attorney for the tenth judicial district, and was reelected in 1859, serving until he resigned to enter the Confederate army early in 1861. His service in that office was able and brilliant, and while an effective and vigorous prosecutor, he became a popular favorite.

His face and person were exceedingly handsome, his courtesy winning, his intellect bright and quick, his manner energetic, and his rise at the bar to distinction rapid.

At that time there were no railroads in that part of Mississippi and the bar at each court-house was marked by ability as lawyers and great good fellowship. The circuit was made by attorneys in private conveyances, attended by servants, and the business of the courts, made interesting by the conflict of learning and wit, was also brightened by the generous hospitality of the local bar and the citizens of the respective towns. In this goodly company no man could hope for either professional or social success without the aid of intellect, learning, integrity, and honor. Amid these congenial spirits the young district attorney was in his element, and his good qualities were amply recognized, and present success and reasonable expectation incited him to harder study and higher achievement.

In the spring of 1861 he was elected the first lieutenant of Company H, Fifteenth Mississippi. Shortly after the organization of the regiment, on the 15th of June, the lieutenant-colonel resigned to accept the appointment of surgeon, and Lieutenant WALTHALL was elected lieutenant-colonel. This regiment did brilliant service at Fishing Creek, or Mill Springs, in Kentucky, and here he won his spurs by a splendid display of that cool intrepidity which became the striking characteristic of his career. On the 11th of April, 1862, he was elected colonel of the Twenty-ninth Mississippi Infantry. On the 30th of June the same year he was appointed brigadier-general, to take effect the 13th of December, 1862. His brigade was composed of the Twenty-fourth, Twenty-seventh, Twenty-ninth, Thirtieth, and Thirty-fourth Mississippi Infantry.

On the 6th of June, 1864, he was appointed major-general. His division was composed of the brigades of Generals Quarles, Canty, and Reynolds.

Seven days after his appointment as major-general, Lieut. Gen. Leonidas Polk, the bishop general, was killed at Pine Mountain, and three names were sent to Richmond to be considered as his successor. These were the names of Maj. Gen. A. P. Stewart, Maj. Gen. William B. Bate, and Maj. Gen. E. C. WALTHALL.

I speak now with great pleasure of an incident that, in this world of struggle and rivalry, especially in military affairs, has rarely occurred.

General Bate and General WALTHALL wrote letters warmly endorsing General Stewart for the promotion, and magnanimously retiring themselves from consideration. They presented the facts of the seniority and military education of General Stewart, and would not permit their names to be used in competition with his. Both these men had gallantly won the substantial honor, and would have been justified in at least allowing the executive to weigh the merits of all three.

The modesty of General BATE, now a distinguished member of this Senate, is only equaled by the valor his wounds attest and will not permit him to mention this episode, as honorable to him as his feats of arms.

Of this magnanimous act General WALTHALL rarely spoke, but those who knew him best can imagine the honorable pride with which he unselfishly relinquished all claim to the prize.

After the close of the war he returned to Coffeeville, Miss., to resume the practice of his profession in association with L. Q. C. Lamar until January, 1871, when he removed to Grenada.

When the distinguished Lamar was appointed to the Cabinet by Mr. Cleveland March 4, 1885, General WALTHALL succeeded him by appointment, and was elected in January, 1886, for the unexpired term, was reelected in 1888 and again in 1892. Directly afterwards his health became very feeble, and, living up to his high sense of public duty, he resigned in January, 1894, his position for the balance of that term. He had already been reelected for the term beginning March, 1895, at which time he reentered the Senate to meet the welcome of his former associates.

It is not my purpose to follow the course of General WALTHALL through the several campaigns in which he was actively engaged, nor to describe nor even name the many battles in which he took a conspicuous part; but it is proper to mention a few of those which particularly displayed his soldierly qualities.

The battle of Lookout Mountain, which has been so exaggerated as "the battle above the clouds" in the fervid imagination of poetry and in the cold mendacity of prose, particularly distinguished the unflinching courage and the calm intrepidity of General WALTHALL.

There were no clouds that day—only a mist that came up from the valley.

WALTHALL's brigade of 1,500 men were ordered to hold the position occupied by a picket post extending from Lookout Creek up the side of the mountain, continuing across a bench to the cliff. The road by which relief must come or retreat be made, as well as the position, were swept by the fire of the Federal batteries of Parrott guns on Moccasin Point. General Hooker attacked WALTHALL's line upon his front and left flank with a division of 10,000.

The brave Mississippians, under their gallant leader, made good their resistance until they could be re-formed beyond the reach of the batteries. At 1 o'clock General Pettus, now present as a member of the Senate, came to the relief with his brigade, and the Confederate line held its new position until after dark.

General Thomas, in his report, says the resistance by WALTHALL was "stubborn;" General Bragg characterizes the resistance as "desperate," and the impartial historian writes it as "brilliant and desperate."

What was left of this brigade from this terrible fight—about 600 effectives—on the afternoon of the next day was thrown across Missionary Ridge to protect Hardee's left flank in retreat, and held the position until ordered away at 8 o'clock that night.

In this fight General WALTHALL received a severe wound in the foot, but left neither the field nor the saddle, enduring severe pain with stoic fortitude rather than discourage his men by retiring. He was confined for six weeks by this wound.

Upon the retreat of Hood from Nashville, when he was pressed hard by Thomas's reinforced and aggressive column, he sent for Lieutenant-General Forrest and asked him if he would undertake to protect the retreat. General Forrest replied: "Give me the major-general of infantry I shall choose and I will undertake it." Out of that army of brave veterans he selected WALTHALL, and it is unnecessary to repeat here the courage, the skill, the heroic daring that marked the defense of the retreating Confederates until the army had crossed the Tennessee River.

Moreau's military reputation was made more glorious by his retreat through the Black Forest than by the victory of Hohenlinden; so this retreat shed as imperishable glory upon Forrest and WALTHALL as any won by their most splendid victories.

When the occasion demanded a man of adamant firmness, unfaltering courage, and enduring patience, WALTHALL met the necessity.

In politics Senator WALTHALL was conservative, prudent, and cautious, not given to experiment, but never allowing a difference of opinion to impair his fidelity to his party.

He did not like joint debates, so usual in the South, and, in fact, did not often speak in political campaigns.

He was a delegate to the national conventions in 1868, 1876, 1880, 1884, and in 1896, and in four of them, by common consent, he was chairman of the delegation.

As a Senator he was devoted to the interest of his constituency, both in legislation in which they were concerned and in any private matters which would properly come before him. He was constant in attendance on committee meetings and industrious and scrupulous in performing the work allotted to him. He was always present at the sessions of the Senate, and when his health became so feeble in 1894 that he doubted his ability to give his usual attention to the performance of his duties he resigned his seat for the balance of his term—about fourteen months. His high standard of duty would not allow him to hold an office when unable to fully perform its functions.

While he did not often speak in the debates in this Chamber, his advice was often sought and highly valued.

He had great respect for law, for established authority. He was loath to disturb the regular order of things, respected usages and customs, was not in any sense an innovator, and had the qualities that better fitted him to suppress a revolution than to lead one.

He was just in allowing to everyone all to which he was entitled, yet firm in the insistence of his own rights. He was particularly jealous of his military reputation and never permitted any disparagement of it, even indirectly, to pass unchallenged and uncorrected.

Tributes of admiration to his intellectual endowments, to his resolute and valiant heart, his strong serenity of mind, to the just balance of his moral and intellectual nature, his softness and polish of manner with no trace of formality, always genial and accessible, although full of a quiet and simple dignity, and his talent and acquirements, will be paid by others in strong and clear outline, for these were his great characteristics as a public man; and this character he has left, a proud heritage to his countrymen, to be embalmed in their hearts and by their eloquence recorded in the history of a nation who thus delights to honor her illustrious dead; but the leading features of his character, to those who knew him when he unbent from the cares of public life, can be given their true valuation by his intimate friends only.

Among these the living and transparent graces of his well-regulated mind and heart, his pensive cheerfulness, the quick and kindly responsiveness of his nature, overflowing with gentleness and sympathy, attracted the coldest and most insensible soul.

Friendship existed in him in its loveliest proportions; it was one of the profoundest emotions of his heart; and this relation, when founded on real worth and once established, knew no bounds nor diminution.

He discerned no weaknesses, no shortcomings in the man he called friend. In its amplitude he listened to the voice of his heart alone. There seems to have been a far-reaching depth of personal identity or individuality, which drew men to him whose affection was soon lost in the abysses of this deep heart. The constancy of his own feeling met with that warm and faithful devotion which he gave in such fullness and so generously.

He was the idol of his soldiers, who followed him with unbounded enthusiasm. He was their inspiring leader in battle; in the hospital, around the camp fire, he was their comforter, their protector; and when peace came, and the dark waters of that sorrowful defeat rolled in and drowned every hope of the Southern heart, he was their stimulator to a new life under changed conditions. He forsook them not in their adversity and despondency. He recalled their fidelity, their courage, their hopeless struggle; he remembered the desolation of their battle-scarred land, and his noble heart gave to them of his strength and his hope, so that when WALTHALL's name was spoken among them, the bright example he was giving them of resurrected prosperity resulting from earnest endeavor, of success of the highest nature, they took heart and held him in war as in peace—their guiding spirit. It is not difficult for any man who knew Senator WALTHALL to comprehend the trust and affection he inspired. His delicately shaded mind enabled him to feel with those who appealed to him for help of any sort. At once there was the flash of a kindly impulse to succor his old soldiers in their distresses, to cheer the disheartened, to speak words of solace, and with matchless tenderness, force, and fidelity, to lay a soothing hand upon the hearts of his suffering comrades.

I come now to speak of my friend as I know him in the family circle. Here he shone in his fairest light. It was in the dear home in Grenada, with his beloved wife, among admirers and friends, he found true and sweet rest. With his capacious heart, his generous nature, his truly refined and gentle spirit, is it surprising to know with what devotion he was beloved by his noble wife and all those who were connected with him by near and dear ties? The happiness he enjoyed in these tender relations shone in his face with a luster begotten only of the most genuine and deepest and most sacred feelings of the human heart.

He could afford to cease from his labors, for his work had been well and gloriously done. Into the higher regions of the unseen, the silent—which are but shadows to us—beyond the visible, the tangible, the audible things of this world, his soul has taken its flight; the mortal has fallen away from the immortal spark, which, born among celestial fires, has found its way back to its radiant home.

The poet asks:

Can storied urn, or animated bust,
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
Or flattery soothe the dull cold ear of death?

We answer "No!" but the marble shaft, the just panegyric, forever bear witness to intellect, to soul, to those high qualities that make the world better for their being, and incite in those who follow a glorious and fruitful emulation.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, General WALTHALL was not one of those who immediately become well known to all men. But it did soon come to pass that all who knew him instinctively respected him, and those who knew him best loved him. Whatever quality is needed to form a true gentleman he possessed. He was just, peaceable, kind, generous, courteous in address, brave, true to all duties and obligations.

Some of us have served with him on the Committee on Military Affairs thirteen years, less the fourteen months when he was absent because of ill health. His presence was always a pleasure. His judgment was sound; his temper perfect. Before that committee came many cases of erroneous record to be corrected—cases of injustice, owing to haste or carelessness or momentary petulance, new evidence that failed to reach a court-martial, etc., almost without end. In his treatment of all such matters no stranger coming as a casual observer could have discovered on which side of the great war he had ranged himself.

He was eminently judicial, yielding rather to the generous equities that the legislative branch may dispense than to the literal severities of law.

It was—

A kind true heart, a spirit high,
That could not fear and would not bow.

Those who met him in war forgot their quarrel. Succeeding it was "the courtesy that befits ancient foes turned friends."

Fortunate the man who won his friendship, fortunate the soldier he commanded, fortunate the State whose Senator he became, fortunate the country he served.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, on the morning after the death of General WALTHALL there appeared in the Washington Post an article so well written and which showed upon the part of the writer such a thorough and accurate knowledge of the character of General WALTHALL that I desire it to go into the RECORD. I ask that the Secretary read it from the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

EDWARD CARY WALTHALL.

The death of Senator EDWARD CARY WALTHALL, of Mississippi, removes one of the most gallant and gracious figures in public life. He was a representative of the old South, the South of the great landed aristocracy, of gentle birth and high breeding and chivalrous practices and instincts. He was a gentleman in the finest and noblest sense of the word—not for occasion or parade, but always and under any imaginable circumstance. Courteous to the lowly as well as to the proud, considerate of poor and rich alike, he presented to his generation a most attractive personality, an example of all the manly virtues.

There was a man never noisy or aggressive, but calm and self-contained, conscious of his own sweet impulses, and governed by a pure, unquestioning self-respect. Behind his courtly manners, his intuitive good will toward men, and his spontaneous reverence for women, those who had the privilege of knowing him well and closely discerned the knightly heart that inspired every action of his life. Such men as EDWARD CARY WALTHALL explained to us the pride and glory of the South of forty years ago, its strength, its influence upon the thought and character of that time, its lofty standards, and its sensitive and jealous dignity.

He had for all a generous welcome and a splendid courtesy, yet he was enveloped in an atmosphere which no one ventured to invade unasked. He was the type of a class now rapidly disappearing. He belonged to another and a finer time. His was the bearing of the grand seigneur, his the kindness of an innocent and noble soul.

A brave and honorable gentleman, gallant as any paladin that rode with Charlemagne, simple, straightforward, and loyal as the day, he leaves with us a memory full of grace, an example worthy of all gratitude and emulation. His death is a bereavement as his life was a benefaction to the State of Mississippi, if not to the entire South. He will be mourned as profoundly as, throughout his public career, he has been respected and admired.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, it is not possible for any man, either in a single newspaper article or in a single address and within a brief period of time, to do full and complete justice to the illustrious life and high and lofty character of General WALTHALL.

In all the qualities that command respect, compel admiration, and inspire love I have never known anyone who surpassed him. In his entire life, so conspicuous in many ways, there was never a blot upon his character, never a stain upon his fair name. He stood high up upon the mountain, far above and far removed from all that was base, all that was low, and all that was impure. He thought no evil, he spoke no slander, and repeated none spoken by others.

He trespassed upon no man's rights and never intentionally did any one an injustice, and yet if it was necessary, in order to defend himself or others, or to maintain his self-respect, no man would more quickly, fearlessly, or effectually resent a wrong or an insult. He was a man of a high order of ability and of many kinds of ability. He had read many books and had thought much. He knew his fellow-men well. He had a rare and most remarkable judgment, which seldom led to error. He knew intuitively that which was right and that which was wrong, and it never occurred to him that he was at liberty to choose between the two.

In all of his associations and dealings with his fellow-men he had erected for himself the highest possible standard, yet he never complained if others fell below it, and he neither assumed nor pretended superior virtues, and never in word or manner sought to exalt himself by calling attention to the defects of others. He was that character of man to whom all men who knew him turned instinctively for counsel and advice in matters of gravest concern to themselves. He gave it generously and always unselfishly. He spoke the truth boldly and fearlessly, yet always in kindness and never with a desire to wound. If any sought him with the hope or expectation that they might receive encouragement to evade their duty or find excuse to escape fair and just responsibility, they were always disappointed, and when he had spoken the line between that which was honorable and that which was dishonorable, that which was manly and that which was unmanly, was so clear and so broad that no man could mistake it.

It cost him no effort to be a gentleman; constituted as he was it was impossible for him to be anything else. No man has ever served in this Senate during the years I have been here who possessed the confidence and esteem of all the Senators to a greater extent. No man's judgment was more highly respected and no man's influence was greater. And I believe that I speak the truth when I say that no man was so much loved by so many of his associates as General WALTHALL.

He won great distinction as a soldier during the civil war; he fought his way up from first lieutenant to major-general; he was the idol of those whom he commanded. As a commanding officer he had the rare quality of being most self-possessed, coolest, and most courageous when the danger was greatest; most magnanimous and most generous in the hour of victory; most self-respecting, self-reliant, and proudest of the cause for which he fought in the hour of defeat. It was at Mill Springs, or Fishing Creek, Kentucky, where he first showed that unconquerable spirit, that ready resource in disaster, and that high courage which subsequently made him so conspicuous as a soldier. When the commanding general had fallen, when the untrained soldiers were in the greatest confusion, and when all seemed lost, Lieutenant-Colonel WALTHALL of the Fifteenth Mississippi held his men in line, threw them in front of the advancing foe and saved the army from great disaster. The reputation he made at this battle caused him to be chosen colonel of the Twenty-ninth Mississippi, and in December, 1863, he was promoted to brigadier-general.

In the great battle of Chickamauga he led his brigade into the thickest of the fight and 33 per cent of his men were killed and wounded, and by his rare judgment, his courage and gallant bearing upon the field he added greatly to the fame he had already acquired. At Missionary Ridge, when the Confederate lines were broken, when confusion and disorder were everywhere, when it seemed that the total destruction of the army was inevitable, General WALTHALL, although badly wounded, kept the saddle, held his men in line, drove back the victorious forces of the Union Army and withdrew in good order, and when the army was safe across the river he was lifted from his horse unable to walk. He participated in all the battles from Missionary Ridge to Atlanta, and in June, 1864, was made a major-general. In the fearful slaughter at Franklin his division was in the front rank of battle, and he was close by Gen. Pat Cleburne, of my State, when that great soldier fell.

In the battle at Nashville his command suffered heavily, but his lines were not broken. When the battle was lost, when it seemed almost impossible that the defeated Confederate army could escape capture, General Hood asked General Forrest if it was possible to hold the rear and save the army. He replied, "Give me WALTHALL to command a division of infantry, and I promise that the army shall retreat in safety." How well he kept his promise, and how superbly General WALTHALL performed his part and justified the confidence of General Forrest, all the country knows. The defeated Confederates passed south to Bentonville, N. C., and there, in the very closing days of the war, they lined up in battle for the last time.

General WALTHALL once told me that on that day every man in the command knew that there was no longer any hope for the South; knew that the days of the Confederacy were numbered; and yet no man faltered; and he said that nothing in his life had ever touched him so much as when he rode down the line on that day and there burst forth from the tattered and torn remnants of his old division the old familiar cheer that had so often greeted him, and that the saddest word he ever spoke was to give the order for the charge that cost many of them their lives.

When the end came, he returned to his home in Mississippi. His ability as a lawyer and his high and well-known character brought him numerous clients, and for nearly twenty years he stood in the front rank of his profession and contested with such lawyers as Wiley P. Harris and James Z. George for the leadership of the bar of Mississippi.

He came here in 1885 as the successor of Senator Lamar, the man whom he admired most and loved best of all the men he had ever known. How well he sustained the high reputation he brought to this body is known to all Senators. His great ability as a lawyer, a soldier, and a Senator, his devotion to duty, his high purposes, and the purity of his life made him a conspicuous figure here from the time he entered the Senate until his death.

But there are many who knew him well in his service of twelve years here who do not know of his many generous deeds, his sacrifice for others, and his great tenderness toward his family and those whom he loved. He never failed to remember all who had any claim, direct or indirect, upon his generosity. No man who was a soldier under him, whether he lived in Mississippi or elsewhere, ever called upon him for aid that it was not generously given. That which endeared him most to those who knew him best was his thoughtful consideration for others, his readiness to sacrifice himself for his friends, and his kindness and tenderness for all who suffered and all who were in distress.

History has recorded and generations have applauded the noble act of Sir Philip Sidney, who, when his own death was fast approaching, gave the water brought to quench his dying thirst to the wounded soldier. On that terrible retreat from Nashville, on that fearful winter night never to be forgotten by those who followed Hood, General WALTHALL folded his last blanket around a wounded soldier and spent the night on the frozen ground without shelter. In his last sickness, when the fever was coursing through his veins, with the fearful pain in his brain, he did not even then forget his consideration for others, and he said:

Tell Mr. Spooner, with whom I am paired, that it is unfair to him to lose his vote on important questions while I am sick, and that he is at perfect liberty to vote as he deems proper.

We all remember his last appearance upon the floor of the Senate. He came here when he was so weak that he was hardly able to walk; he came against the advice of his physician and against the wishes of his family and friends; he came because he believed it to be his duty to come, and standing where I am standing now—for I am speaking from his desk—delivered that eloquent eulogy and paid that magnificent tribute to the life and character of his late colleague, Senator George.

Two weeks from that day, on the evening of the 21st of April, his great spirit crossed over the dark river, and there passed from this earth the truest, the bravest, and the gentlest man I have ever known. We bore his body to the beautiful town of Holly Springs, in Mississippi. Surrounded by many hundreds of the people whom he had served so faithfully, in the cemetery where his footsteps had often strayed in his boyhood days, near the academy where he had received his early education, close by the town where he was admitted to the bar and began the battle of life, we laid him to rest.

We buried him beneath a multitude of flowers which came as tokens of love from almost every town and village in Mississippi, and mingled with the flowers were the tears of many of the gray-haired and battle-scarred soldiers who had followed him through four years of battle, of bloodshed, and of strife. As I listened on that day to the eloquent words of Bishop Thompson, as he spoke of the pure life and high character of his personal friend, the thought came to me that no man could have been intimately associated with General WALTHALL without being a better man, that no man could have known him well without having a higher and better opinion of human nature, and that in the mysterious and unknown life beyond the grave the Great Ruler of us all would do most for him there who had done most for his fellow-men here.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I am sensible to the point of pain that I can not give expression to the tribute which is in my heart for EDWARD CARY WALTHALL. We came into the Senate within one week of each other. Both lawyers by profession, coming into this great forum without previous legislative experience, he certainly with high ideals, both anxious to serve well the people who had honored us, and distrustful of our power to even approximately maintain the standard created here by our predecessors, we met upon a common plane.

He early admitted me to his friendship, and we entered into a pair with each other which continued during my former term, and was, to my delight, renewed upon my return a little over a year ago.

I shall always count it an honor that he gave me his confidence, and I shall always value the friendship which existed between us. To me the friendship of Senator WALTHALL was of no ordinary quality. It was not effusive, but one who enjoyed it could not fail to realize its steadfastness. It required no nursing. Once gained, nothing could forfeit it or change it but unworthiness in its object. Emerson said of friendship:

It is sublime to feel and say of another, "I never need meet or speak or write to him; we need not reinforce ourselves, or send tokens of remembrance; I rely on him as on myself; if he did thus or thus I know it was right."

This I could always feel of him, and this I can say of him. I never met one in whose personal loyalty I had more implicit trust, or into whose care I would more willingly commit my honor or my life.

Calm, self-contained, thoughtful, always considerate of others, charitable in his judgments, tolerant of differences of opinion, making due allowance for the influence of tradition, association, the prejudices of environment, and all the factors which enter into life, his was a character rare in its evenness and perfection. He was modest, brave, sympathetic, and tender. He always bore about him a dignity of demeanor which, while it never in anywise repelled, commanded ever-increasing respect from those who were his intimates.

It has been said that "familiarity is the most destructive of all iconoclasts." In this sense no one could be his familiar. Those who were nearest to him trusted him most and loved him best.

It has not been my fortune to know a man who more instantly commanded respect and confidence than did he. His bearing was noble, and there was an inborn chivalry about him which no manly man could fail to discern. He was frank, sincere, and just. It is no disparagement of any other to say of him that from the South has come no man who in fuller measure answered to the old-time romantic ideal of the best type of the Southern gentleman than did Senator WALTHALL.

There is no place anywhere, to my knowledge, in which more quickly and with more unerring accuracy is judgment formed of the nature, ability, strong points, and weak points of a man than in the Senate; and I recall that among my colleagues on the Republican side of the Senate, in the frank interchange of opinion upon newcomers, there was universal expression of respect for Senator WALTHALL; and the sad news that he had passed into the Silence, stirless rest,

That change which never changes, brought to the heart of every Senator a keen sense of personal bereavement.

In the time when he came to the Senate there was still existent much of bitterness and sectional suspicion and animosity, the inevitable result of the war and of the political phases which followed it. I confess that I shared that bitterness, and more than once participated in impassioned and denunciatory debate upon sectional lines. All good men rejoice that it has, for the most part, passed away, and no one rejoiced more than Senator WALTHALL that the healing power of time was effacing the wounds and eliminating the bitterness which had held us apart. True, some of the problems are still unsolved, but the people trust to time, patriotism, and a spirit of brotherhood to rightly solve them.

He was in all ways a fit successor to the brilliant and able Lamar, of whom it will always be well remembered that he, of all the Southern statesmen, was the first in public place to sound the sweet note of returning fraternity, and to point his people and our people forward to a time when in heart, in patriotism, in hope, and in pride of a common country and a common flag, we should be one again and forever.

I utter a conviction, born of a consciousness of the influence which his candor and breadth and frankness and the earnest hope, often expressed by Senator WALTHALL, for renewed friendship and fraternity between the sections of our country, had upon my own thought and feeling, when I say that to him and to his presence, more than to any other, is due, in my judgment, the obliteration here of sectional animosity, and the restoration of that amity and confidence so essential to the prosperity and the strength of the Republic.

He seldom participated in debate, although able to cope with any antagonist; but I remember that his first speech, to which the Senate listened intently, won universal commendation, although upon a sectional subject, by the temperate spirit which pervaded it.

He was the first man to teach me that a Confederate soldier, who had won by chivalrous daring his way from the rank of a lieutenant to that of a major-general, and who had led in a hundred battles under a flag which I had hated and against one which I loved, could be as loyal and as faithful to a reunited Republic and to its flag as if there had never been a division among us.

I can easily believe what I have been told by those who have seen him leading the Southern hosts into battle, that he was an ideal soldier, worshiped by the officers and men who served under him, and loved and implicitly trusted by those under whom he served.

He was an able and erudite lawyer. Many times I have had occasion to discuss with him legal questions in a conversational way, notably on an occasion within a year, and it was obvious that his mind was stored with legal principles, well digested and thoroughly and accurately understood. He possessed in a wonderful degree the elements which would have made him a great judge. He was essentially reflective, with fine power not only of analysis but of generalization, and of rare judgment.

No one who knew him will fail to remember of him that he was unusually discriminating and with profound and nice ethical sense; a safe man, always, to consult with the utmost confidence when one had any doubt upon a question of honor or propriety of conduct.

He hated sham or pretense. Always ready to give to every man his due, he had a contempt for one who claimed more than his due. Never a stickler for the credit due himself for any generous, honorable, or brave act, he despised beyond expression one willing to take to himself credit or honor for an act done by another. He rightly thought it the meanest form of larceny.

I have not known a man who seemed to me more incapable of an unworthy suspicion or an ignoble thought or act than Senator WALTHALL. And while sometimes here in the heat of debate we say harsh things to one another and of one another, and criticize each other's foibles, weaknesses, and peculiarities, I venture to say that no one ever heard a Senator speak other than in terms of the highest respect for the judgment and characteristics of our dead friend and colleague.

I was not surprised upon my return to the Senate to find him, although in an unostentatious and quiet way, a leader of peculiar power and influence upon that side of this Chamber and so regarded upon this. He made no effort, Mr. President, to win that place. It came to him because it was his due. It was the tribute unconsciously and naturally paid him by appreciative colleagues because of the nobility of his character and the wisdom of his judgment.

It needs not to be said that such a man hated oppression or cruelty. I can not forbear to mention that once, years ago, walking with him down the Avenue, we came across a burly colored man maltreating a ragged, unresisting, weeping colored lad, and I shall never forget how, without a word, with flashing eyes and a pallor brought by indignation into his face, Senator WALTHALL, with strong, quick arm, protected the little one from cruelty and in a manner to make it a lesson to be well remembered by his oppressor, and as we walked along he was as calm as if he were entering a drawing room and as silent about it as if it had been a matter of course. When it was a matter of fair play or humanity, there was no "color line" with him; and any creature, man or woman, child or animal, who or which was being oppressed or treated with cruelty found a ready sympathy in his heart and a prompt defender in his strength.

I have said that he was considerate, and I must be permitted, since I was the object of it, although it has been beautifully mentioned by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], his dear friend, to call again to the attention of the Senate the fact that his last known thought of the Senate and of public duty here was marked by that unselfish consideration for others which ever characterized his conduct.

As he lay dying, Mr. President, released for a little time from the grip of delirium, his body racked with pain, he recalled the fact that we were speedily to vote upon the question of war, and sent word to me by the Senator from Arkansas that he did not feel it would be fair that I should be precluded by reason of his absence from casting my vote upon such a question, and that he desired me to consider myself free to that end. This beautiful trait, possessed by him in such rare measure, ran like golden threads through the warp and woof of his whole life and endeared him to all with whom he came in contact.

I would not for all the world, Mr. President, consciously speak a fulsome word of eulogy above this new-made grave, yet I have said nothing of any fault or foible in him. I knew him long and well, but I did not know him long enough or well enough to discover any fault or weakness in his character.

His beliefs upon all the questions which divide parties were the opposite of mine. Upon these differences we never spoke. How much of his opinions or of mine were due to the power of association, the strength of tradition, I know not. I never allowed myself to doubt that in all his beliefs he was sincere and, from his standpoint, purely patriotic.

In an inadequate and imperfect way I have given my estimate of him as a man. I had for him strong affection. He was a true knight, "without fear and without reproach," faithful in his friendships, loyal to his convictions. Well, indeed, did he obey the injunction of Chalmers: "Write your name in kindness, love, and mercy on the hearts of the thousands you come in contact with year by year, and you will never be forgotten." He will not be forgotten, Mr. President. In all the time to come, among the most priceless treasures of Mississippi, the State to which he gave his devoted love, will be the name and fame of EDWARD CARY WALTHALL, and here at the Capitol of the nation his career as a Senator will be a fragrant memory so long as any who have served here in this generation shall be remembered.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the task I have undertaken to perform is the most difficult that has ever fallen to my lot. To speak here of the man I had come to love as a brother, how shall I do it and avoid, on the one hand, the display of a private grief, unbecoming this presence, and, on the other, the perfunctory and conventional phrases of obituary eulogy?

I would prefer to be a silent mourner for my lost friend, to embalm his memory in my heart, and wait upon the soothing effects of time to assuage my sorrow. I can do nothing now but add my voice to the general lamentation or swell the chorus of praise that has followed WALTHALL to his last long home.

In that beautiful country where last month we buried him amid a wilderness of flowers, the offerings of a sorrowing and affectionate people, the summer winds will chant his requiem and the silent stars will keep vigil over his grave. But the winds will never blow and the stars will never shine upon a truer, knightlier, or purer soul than WALTHALL'S.

There are certain words in our language which come spontaneously to our lips when speaking of our departed friend, words full of meaning and tense with feeling and emotion. They would fall unpleasantly on the ear were they ordinarily used, and offend against those canons of taste which forbid exaggeration or extravagance in speech. But they fall pleasantly on the ear when applied to WALTHALL, and, suggesting nothing but the truth, can not offend when used to portray his character.

"Chivalrous" and "knightly" are these words, often abused and misapplied. It seems as if they were reserved to have their full meaning, and all that they imply, illustrated by his life and conduct. If to be chivalrous is to be high-minded, magnanimous, courageous, unselfish, gentle, and true, preferring death to dishonor, then WALTHALL was the embodiment of chivalry. He never lowered his standard, never compromised his convictions of duty; and all this rigidity of moral principle was covered with the mantle of his affectionate and kindly personality, which drew men to him and made them his friends.

He was a gentleman in the best acceptance of that word, and I have sometimes thought that the best way to define the word was to point to him as the embodiment of all that it meant. The best description of a gentleman that I know is that given by inspiration in the Fifteenth Psalm, and to no one could it be more justly applied than to our departed friend:

Lord, who shall abide in Thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in Thy holy hill?
3. He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart.

4. He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbor, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbor.

5. In whose eyes a vile person is contained; but he honoureth them that fear the Lord. He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not.

6. He that putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh reward against the innocent. He that doeth these things shall never be moved.

Mr. President, the world is better for such lives as WALTHALL'S; and though the circle of his friends, the Senate and the State that loved him, and the country at large, are poorer by his death, they can never lose the legacy of his noble character and its inspiration to high living and unselfish devotion to high ideals.

There is no contribution that Mississippi could have made to the nation that could have compared in enduring value to that of the character of her great soldier and statesman whose death we mourn to-day, and no State in this great sisterhood of States can fail to realize the bright hopes of a high destiny that breeds such men and builds such character.

"The world is upheld by the veracity of good men; they make the earth wholesome." A State or a Commonwealth takes its reputation from its ideals, and a society that honors such character as WALTHALL'S is itself honored.

General WALTHALL'S reputation as a soldier can better be spoken of by others; that it was of the highest I have the testimony of those who are best qualified to speak—his fellow-soldiers of the South. As intimate as it was my good fortune to be with him, I rarely heard him allude to the great epic of the civil war, in which his part was so conspicuous and honorable, and then only to some phase or incident of it unrelated to himself. That he was a great soldier I have learned from the history of the war, and I read the story of his affection for the men whom he commanded and with whom he shared the hardships and dangers of the camp and field, and of their devotion to him, in the tear-stained faces of the survivors of his old brigade, as they marched behind his hearse, laden with the flowers that were to make beautiful his open grave.

As a Senator it is needless that I should speak of him in the hearing of those, his colleagues, who surround me. We all remember sadly to-day the erect and gallant form which was rarely absent from its seat during a session of the Senate. Attentive, vigilant, and untiring in the performance of his public duty, Senator WALTHALL served his State and his country with a fidelity I have never seen surpassed. How wise he was in counsel, how steady and self-contained when others were excited, and how naturally we all turned to him for advice and leadership! Rarely taking the floor to speak, never exploiting himself, he exercised an influence on this body and its individual members which it and they were glad to recognize, and which was always for good. Here, as elsewhere, he contributed to the body of which he was a member the inestimable boon of his high character.

We were all glad to have him pointed out as a representative Senator and to put him in the front rank of those whose presence here was to refute the calumnies with which this body is sometimes assailed. That he did not often indulge in speechmaking was not because he could not speak well. Few excelled him in forceful and persuasive speech. With clear apprehension of the point in discussion, his arguments were logical and well ordered and calculated to convince. His mind was honest. It could not consciously tolerate fallacious reasoning, and the sincerity of his conviction tended to carry conviction to the minds of others. But the innate modesty and the self-suppressing habit of his life kept him from claiming the applause he could so easily win.

Mr. President, I have already said that one need have no fear of making himself amenable to the charge of extravagance or exaggeration in speaking of the character of Senator WALTHALL. I have no such fear. Yet all that I have said seems to me commonplace and unworthy. I can not dissect and criticize the elements that went to make up the rounded whole of his beautiful life. Faults doubtless there were, but I can not try to discover them. Words of cold criticism would tremble and falter on my lips should I try to utter them. I can only speak from the standpoint of my affection and admiration. It is not now the wise statesman, the intrepid soldier and commander, or the learned and well-equipped lawyer of whom I am thinking.

It is the friend I have lost, and who can never be replaced. It is those things which I feel but can not give utterance to that fill my heart and mind, and it is a tribute of love and affection, not of praise and cold approbation, that I would lay as a chaplet on his grave. Tears, not eulogy, are more fitting and natural to-day. The time is so short since we bore him from this Chamber to sleep in the warm bosom of the State which loved and honored him and amid the gallant people whom he so loved and honored that we still seem in the shadow of his grave. Grief must have its place and claim the privilege of silence rather than of speech.

The name and memory of WALTHALL will long continue a precious tradition of the Senate and an inspiration to ingenuous American youth.

May the simple, genuine spirit of the man who never acted a part or tried to seem other than he was long lover in this storied Chamber.

And though the warrior's sun has set,
Its light shall linger round us yet,
Bright, radiant, blest.

Scarce had he need to doff his pride or slough the dross of earth—
E'en as he trod that day to God so walked he from his birth,
In simpleness and gentleness and honor and clean mirth.

He had done his work and held his peace and had no fear to die.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, during the past few years death has been very busy in this Chamber. It seems but yesterday since we followed from these walls to the tomb the caskets containing the beloved forms of Colquitt, Vance, Harris, and George.

And so close were their deaths upon their retirement from this Chamber that we may include those of McPherson, Coke, and Voorhees, all illustrious Senators and patriots.

And to-day, before the flowers are withered upon the grave of his colleague, we are brought together to lay our offerings on the urn of WALTHALL.

The fountains of human sorrow never run dry. Tears fresh and overflowing will fall when the heart is struck, just as the showers in great drops break from the clouds at the lightning's stroke. Human emotion and sympathy are inexhaustible, and each repetition of bereavement and sympathy calls forth its own grief and affliction.

No death among all others that have taken place in our day has touched more deeply the heart of the Senate than that of our beloved associate, Senator WALTHALL, to whose memory we now record our sense of his loss and our sorrow at his death.

Senator WALTHALL was born and passed his youth in Virginia—that grand nourishing mother of great men—so full of memories and associations to inspire and cultivate the highest and noblest sentiments of duty and patriotism. He settled for life in the then young and vigorous State of Mississippi—the theater of Prentiss, Quitman, Foote, and Davis.

Scarcely had he begun his successful career when the civil war broke out, and for four years his bright and blameless sword shed the glory of Southern arms amid the shields of Johnston, Bragg, Polk, and Breckinridge. The war ended and he returned to his home to meet in work and duty there associates like Lamar, Hooker, Percy, Singleton, and the noble sons of Mississippi. In the full vigor of his faculties and attainments, upon the accession of Senator Lamar to the Cabinet in 1885, Senator WALTHALL came to the Senate.

My first personal knowledge of Senator WALTHALL was derived from Senator Lamar. That very great and very distinguished man spoke of his friend in words that still live in my memory; in words of admiration, affection, and of deepest interest; in words of praise and elevation seldom spoken of any man. The friendship of these eminent men was indeed beautiful; it lasted through life. It reminded me of two stars of the "first magnitude" in the heavens in close proximity, of equal brilliancy, and shedding upon and receiving from each other their united glory.

Of Senator WALTHALL's career in the Senate, after the just and exalted tributes rendered to it, it seems more than superfluous for me to add one word. That career was at all times the same. It was uniform, steady, consistent, constant, conscientious, diligent, dutiful; animated by the purest patriotism, directed to the noblest purposes, sustained by the most enlightened convictions, and untouched by a selfish ambition.

It was useful, honorable, admirable, without shadow or blemish, and commanded universal approbation. If he had any other end save the good of his people and the honor of his country, it was impossible to see or even to suspect it. In all things, at all times, under all circumstances, he was erect. He never stooped, or bent, or swerved, or wavered.

His actions were never dubious; never devious; but always direct, open, candid, fair. He moved on plain, straight lines only. The rays of the sun do not descend from their source with more certainty and truth than did all the words and acts of WALTHALL upon any subject in the Senate presented for his consideration.

He was never aggressive; never presumptuous; never, never offensive. With a sensibility to honor so delicate that he would not brook at life's cost a breath's shadow on his name, he was considerate, courteous, kind, deferential to all who differed with him. He did not believe that he had the right or duty to think for others. He regarded every Senator as the representative of his own State, and that his rights, statements, and arguments, when within the rules of the Senate, were sacred from rudeness and beyond assault and personal criticism.

He was as firm and quiet as the Rock of Gibraltar. He would have suffered martyrdom before he would have submitted to the dishonor of his State or country. But when great issues were at stake, when differences shook the country or his party, when peril to either was present, he was always ready and prompt to agree and unite with a majority of good men in measures of conciliation and adjustment which did not vitally threaten the life or honor of the country.

He had great respect for the judgment of his peers, and he accorded to them the same sincerity of conviction and propriety of action which he knew controlled him. He spoke pure, chaste, classic English. He was an Anglo-Saxon in his style and not Greek or Roman. When I heard him I often thought that, like my old friend Charles J. M. Gwynn, attorney-general of Maryland, he had doubtless acquired his style from the best models of the great lawyers of England and the United States.

Senator WALTHALL was eccentric in nothing. He was never extreme, never destructive. He was proper, reasonable, conservative always.

In one respect he was happy above nearly all the great men of his time: "He lived and died without enemies." He excited no hostilities. His policy, his principle, was to do no wrong and never to submit to wrong. He was as brave as a lion, yet tender as a gentle woman. His judgment was absolutely fearless and extremely clear. His arguments were generally axioms, and the influence of his position with men was very controlling. His positions were taken after great deliberation, and it was never safe to combat them without preparation.

In the Senate he was exceedingly useful. While maintaining with highest integrity the dignity of a Southern man who had once taken up arms against the Government, he did not permit one sectional prejudice to disturb his sense of duty to the Union. His love for the South made his duty to the Union, his devotion to the country, more sacred.

It is impossible to do justice to the propriety of his manner. It was exquisite. Not after the method of Chesterfield; it was natural, sincere, agreeable; without artifice, very manly, and producing confidence and attachment and highest esteem; it reflected and expressed in every action and tone the soul of which it was the shadow.

He never sought office. His people sought him to bestow position—high position—on him. He was uniformly elected a Senator without competition, and while justly cherishing the great honor, he could and did lay aside a seat in the Senate with the serenity of a philosopher because he supposed his health not equal to the duty.

As a statesman he was never subjected to its supreme trial. He never had to oppose and resist a mighty impulse of his people which his judgment condemned as wrong and dangerous. Had that terrible condition confronted him, I trust that, with the sublime quality of Washington, he would have stood like a rock against the furious waves of popular madness and offered himself as a sacrifice to save his country.

Mr. President, he was not perfect. God alone is perfect. But he could not have been as he was without being a true Christian, loving his fellow-man and fearing and obeying his Maker.

Senators, this man was not the child of chance or fortune. This excellent and rare combination and embodiment was the growth and consummation of causes. It was not a charm, or spell, or accident.

Of WALTHALL truly may it be said that all the virtues in their strength and loveliness made up the harmony of his character. Truth, courage, honor, justice, fidelity, love, duty, pity, gratitude, mercy, and prudence presiding over all, combined to form this model of excellence, this man "who lived and died without an enemy."

I fancy that I comprehend to some extent the cause that made him so respected, so admired, so beloved by all. It was not alone the dignity and grace of his presence, the cordial smile on his lips, the elegance of his attire, the propriety of his deportment, the clear words that fell from his lips, the logic, the argument, the persuasion of his speech; not the story of his splendid gallantry on bloody fields, nor his patient fortitude amid disaster; not his eminent success at the law; not alone the rectitude of his moral life, the sweetness of his home, the beautiful exhibition of his humanity; not his long service in the Senate and the proud laurels which he wore; not his lamented death, with its touching surroundings. No! No! It is not one or many of these commendations; but it is the union, the concurrence, of all these qualities, all these virtues, in one harmonious, consistent, invariable whole that commands our admiration, sympathy, and love.

Senators, in the presence of this illustrious and magnificent example we feel like exclaiming, "How inestimable is the value of the patriot to his country!" Who can calculate the worth of this man? His life, his deeds, his services, his purity—all, all, for the good of his country! Society has been exalted by his influence, politics and statesmanship dignified and refined by his association, and the hopes of the Republic and of humanity encouraged by his example.

Peace and honor—beautiful, sweet peace; bright, cloudless honor—to his memory! May precious flowers in the morning shed the incense of loveliest affection on his grave! May evening's soft light hallow its shadows, and may Sculpture contrive a shaft of whitest marble to bespeak the purity of his heart and the excellence of his life!

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, EDWARD CARY WALTHALL, late United States Senator from the State of Mississippi, was born in Richmond, Va., on April 4, 1831.

His father during his son's boyhood removed to Holly Springs, Miss., where the son received an academic education and at an early age began the study of the law, his chosen pursuit in life, and was admitted to the bar in 1852. He removed shortly afterwards to Coffeenville, in his adopted State, and entered upon the practice of his profession. In 1856 he was elected district attorney for the tenth judicial district of the State of Mississippi, and was reelected in 1859.

In the spring of 1861 he resigned his office of district attorney and entered the Confederate service as a second lieutenant in the Fifteenth Mississippi Regiment, and was soon thereafter elected lieutenant-colonel of that regiment. In the spring of 1862 he was elected colonel of the Twenty-ninth Mississippi Regiment, and in the following December was promoted to brigadier-general, and served as such until June, 1864, when he was promoted to major-general, and served as such until the close of the war.

He then resumed the practice of the law at Coffeenville until January, 1871, when he removed to Grenada, and continued his legal practice there until March, 1885.

Early in March, 1885, Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar resigned his seat in the Senate of the United States to accept the office of Secretary of the Interior in President Cleveland's first Cabinet, and General WALTHALL was appointed by the governor of Mississippi to fill the vacancy, and took his seat in the Senate on March 12, 1885.

In January, 1886, he was elected by the legislature for the unexpired term, and was reelected in January, 1888, for the term ending March 3, 1895, and in January, 1892, was reelected for the term ending March 3, 1901.

In January, 1894, on account of ill health, he resigned the unexpired term ending March 3, 1895, and on March 4, 1895, he entered upon his term in the Senate ending March 3, 1901.

He was chosen by the Democratic conventions of his State as a delegate at large to the national Democratic conventions in 1868, 1876, 1880, 1884, and 1896; in 1868 was one of the vice-presidents of the national Democratic convention, and in 1876, 1880, 1884, and 1896 was the chairman of the Mississippi delegation.

He had been in delicate health for some years past. His fatal illness began about February 1, 1898, and he was confined to his apartments in this city for weeks.

On April 7 last, the day set for paying the last tribute to his late colleague, Hon. James Z. George, deceased, Senator WALTHALL, still weak and slightly convalescent, against the protests of his friends and physicians, came to the Senate and delivered an address upon the life and character of his deceased colleague. He contracted a cold, which developed into typhoid pneumonia, against the ravages of which his extraordinary vitality could not successfully combat; and shortly after 5 o'clock in the afternoon of April 21, 1898, his useful, illustrious, and honored career on earth was ended, and he entered upon an immortal life beyond the reach of disease, suffering, or death. Few have lived a nobler, better life; few have enjoyed more fully the respect, confidence, friendship, and affection of the people of his adopted State; few have received higher honors at their hands than Gen. EDWARD CARY WALTHALL.

In all the relations of life and in all the varied positions of trust and honor conferred upon him he was an exemplar—incorruptible, faithful, diligent, earnest, true, and unostentatious. He was a successful and able lawyer—clear, concise, and convincing in the presentation of the facts and law, and justly enjoyed an eminent and enviable position at the bar. In the fearful fratricidal war of 1861 to 1865, when American citizen soldiers met each other in deadly battle array, he entered as a second lieutenant, and by his fearless gallantry and clearly developed military abilities he justly merited and rose from rank to rank to major-general.

In his general bearing and his striking and attractive personality he was the ideal soldier and officer.

When the war closed, the wisest, broadest statesmanship, the noblest humanity, and the purest Christianity demanded peace, reconciliation, and fraternity among all our people, North, South, East, and West, that the wounds, bruises, and devastations of the war might be healed and repaired and we might become one people, in one country, under one flag, with like purposes, hopes, and aspirations. To the full accomplishment of this glorious result, now realized and felt by all our people within all our extended domain, General WALTHALL contributed his full share. In the discharge of all his official duties as a Senator he was punctual, faithful, industrious, and reliable, and was a wise, safe, and conservative counselor.

He served with marked ability on many important committees, and was at his death a member of the Committees on Finance, Military Affairs, Civil Service and Retrenchment, and Rules. Few Senators have ever enjoyed more fully the admiration, respect, and confidence of his colleagues in this Chamber.

As a husband he was faithful, tender, and devoted.

In 1863 and 1864 I became personally acquainted with General WALTHALL, and our acquaintance soon ripened into the warmest personal friendship. I feel his death as a personal bereavement. He was a constant, true, and faithful friend, unassuming and unselfish. His companionship was always interesting, pleasant, and attractive.

I respected, admired, and loved him for his nobility of character in all the relations of life and for his abilities and wisdom. We shall miss his presence in this Chamber, and shall feel the loss of his intelligent and useful labors, his prudent and wise counsels, and his fearless and impartial actions. He was a fearless, model soldier, a true friend, a most useful Senator, a wise and able statesman, and the most perfect, exemplary gentleman.

Mr. BATE. For the second time, Mr. President, in the same Congress, the Senate meets to pay its last tribute of admiration and regard to a Senator from Mississippi. But few months have passed since our last mournful garlands were hung over the chair of the late Senator George, of that State, and to-day we are called upon to mingle our regrets at the death of his colleague, EDWARD

CARY WALTHALL. Truly, "Death borders upon our birth, and our cradle stands in the grave," and there are neither exemptions nor exceptions in that dread summons, which serves its process without discrimination as to honors or services—to-day upon a Gladstone, whose fame completes the honors of a century, and to-morrow strikes down some lowly peasant.

Truly, we all "await alike the inevitable hour" and follow only "the paths which lead but to the grave."

The associations of years upon this floor, the concurrence and agreement in public measures, the sympathy and sufferings in the tent and on the field of battle, all prompt me to offer the tribute of my sincerest regard and highest admiration for the memory of EDWARD CARY WALTHALL.

Long personal acquaintance and an earnest appreciation of his many and excellent virtues would induce me, were my powers equal to my will, to erect for him an imperishable monument. As I have been associated with him in the same efforts that have marked his most important public services, I am enabled to bear truthful testimonial of fine character and eminent worth as citizen and Senator in time of peace and as a superb and unsurpassed soldier in time of war. His sudden departure from the public service, from home, family, and friends can not fail to arouse in the minds of all who knew him sentiments of profound regret.

In this great community of States, Mississippi has many sympathizers, who will bear heartfelt testimony of their appreciation of the eminent character of her representatives in this body.

Senator WALTHALL was a native of Richmond, Va. At an early age he emigrated to the State of Mississippi. Here he received his education and grew to distinguished manhood. Here he won the esteem of his fellow-citizens and received the honors that crown his memory. Here were formed his early associations; here were matured the political sentiments that guided and directed him through life.

It is no ordinary character that we are called upon to portray. From his quiet, courteous deportment among his fellow-Senators, from his words of truth and earnestness, we can measure our sad bereavement. We may not expect soon to see that gentle dignity united to that heroic courage and chivalric sense of honor that felt a stain worse than a wound.

He took in by inheritance, as it were, the principles of Democracy as taught by the Virginia fathers; he imbibed their spirit as a natural gift through the atmosphere of free thought. They were thoroughly imbued with the conviction of the inherent right of the people to govern themselves. These convictions Mr. Jefferson had crystallized in his immortal work. This has become the political gospel of men of noble aspirations and all friends of the equal worth of men. The relations of the State to the Federal Government were clearly defined in Mr. Jefferson's celebrated resolutions that became an important chapter in the political history of that Commonwealth.

The same principles obtained no less prominence in Mississippi and were advocated with more intensity. In no State were political questions treated with more earnest convictions. The principles of Democracy in all their various aspects were maintained by a body of the most eloquent, learned, and determined advocates that ever appeared on the hustings. The public intelligence was never more completely cultivated and the general acquaintance with all the great political issues was thorough.

Among the leading political debaters may be ranked McNutt, Poindexter, Foote, Davis, and the matchless orator, Prentiss. The bench and the bar of the State were occupied with men noted for their learning and brilliant advocacy. It was amid a galaxy of illustrious names that Senator WALTHALL received his first political lessons and made his advent in the legal profession. His professional course was dictated by his moral personality; and his personality was the same in all relations of life.

A sincere and earnest purpose in his intercourse with all men in public or private duties marked the conduct of a character that never departed from the most delicate shades of honor. In all his eventful life, in peace and war, no suspicion that could mar his well-regulated conduct with men was ever entertained. So careful and just to all with whom he had relations was he that he was exempt from censure.

Senator WALTHALL received an academic education in Holly Springs, Miss., and studied law, and was there admitted to practice. He devoted himself with that assiduity that has ever marked his course in life. His success was rapid and remunerative, and soon he stood among the leaders of his profession, pre-eminent for brilliant talents and legal learning. He attained distinction and went to the front free from envy or antagonistic rivalry. This was the result of his personality.

He was in harmony with the people in their political sentiments. He was endowed by nature with a refined sensibility that introduced him to the confidence of the profession and the people. A supreme regard for the interests of his clients and the sanctity of his duty to them rendered him careful in the preparation of his cases and earnest in their advocacy. This gave him influence with the court and jury. A lofty integrity and an acute sense of honor disrobed him of any suspicion of professional trick or the possibility of trifling with the interests of those who had confided in him.

With a zeal reinforced by an ardent sense of duty he devoted an intelligence that always proved adequate to the exigencies. His conscientious regard for his client's rights excited the most careful consideration of the principles involved. An exact judgment and an acute, penetrating, and active intellect were brought to the subject before him. A refined, courteous manner, born of his respect for the dignity and worth of all men, secured for him the respect of all classes. He had no strong yearning for office, but a determination to deserve the confidence of the community in his character for integrity and sincerity.

Instructed by the light of a former generation and encouraged by the success that had crowned their sublime purpose under like conditions, and seeing with impatience that which they believed to be a studied effort to deprive them of constitutional rights, the States of the South resolved, respectively, to assert their sovereign rights and retire from the Union and form a new republic that would be influenced by the voice of her own people, among whom similar pursuits created similar interests.

They were not dissatisfied with the Republic of their fathers, but they feared for their dearest interests under the influence of new political principles that had triumphed in the Republic, which they regarded as a direct menace to their institutions. Long and anxious had the people anticipated the crisis. Forty years of discussion and waiting had brought to them full fruits of their painful anxiety. The election of President in 1860 seemed to them the knell of submission or the establishment of a new government "founded on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them seemed most likely to affect their safety and happiness."

Senator WALTHALL, thoroughly imbued with these views, earnestly enlisted in the cause of his native and beloved South. His soldierly qualities, his fine powers, and earnest nature carried him through the military grades to that of major-general. He acted from patriotic conviction and in response to the demand of his State, which was his sovereign, and, if I may say so, in obedience to the demands of that unseen force that broods over human society and inspires the great events that mark the progress of humanity.

Mr. President, all great changes in society are preceded by extraordinary efforts. It is only during the throes of creative epochs that great characters are evolved. They mark the growth of the nations; they impress their purposes, philosophy, and sentiments on the human race. The conspicuous personages in history are evoked by those great epochs that force intense and severe conflicts of sentiments. They erect their monuments on the shores of time in the form of great and good men and noble deeds, and are as conspicuous as are the lofty mountains that mark the topography of the earth.

They are only the living, active forces that are created by the epochs. This period, in which occurred our war between the States, developed many splendid characters, of which any country might be justly proud; and among them is found, in our brief but brilliant Confederate history, the name of Gen. EDWARD C. WALTHALL.

I can not speak too highly of his success. To his fine judgment, earnest and dignified deportment, he added a fervent and unselfish patriotism. His gentle and simple manners were reinforced with the courage and prowess of Chevalier Bayard.

Firm and undaunted in battle, self-poised and resourceful in defeat, as distinguished for his generous humanity as he was revered for his heroic conduct in action, were the characteristics of his army life. He was the same character in war that he was in peace; devoted to his duty, he consecrated his fine powers to the interests of his country, and for the success of the cause he deemed it the supreme act of patriotism to secure its triumphs.

Mr. President, like my honorable friend who has just preceded me, my first soldier acquaintance with General WALTHALL was preceding the Bragg-Rosecrans campaign, the objective of which was south of the Tennessee River. This campaign culminated in the grand historic battle of Chickamauga, in September, 1863. General WALTHALL was on the Confederate side, and was in the forefront from the beginning to the close of that great battle, which history is writing as the best fought battle on both sides during the war. This brilliant victory for the Confederates was soon followed by their defeat at Missionary Ridge, where my friend from Florida [Mr. PASCO] was wounded. WALTHALL heard the shout of victory of the Confederates at Chickamauga, and that of victory from Federals at Missionary Ridge. I can only refer to the winter spent in Dalton, Ga., and the North Georgia campaign of a hundred days, when every movement was a battlefield and every battlefield a graveyard.

For one hundred days cannons thundered and muskets flashed, and for one hundred nights the stars looked down on new-made graves and new battle lines stained with blood, in all of which General WALTHALL bore a conspicuous part. And so around Atlanta and Jonesboro, and then on to the glorious and ill-fated field of Franklin, Tenn., where 6,000 out of less than 15,000 trained and tried Confederate soldiers went down before the Federal breastworks in less than an hour and a half and in the most unjustifiable and unnecessary battle of the war.

It was a victory, but to gain it destroyed an army. WALTHALL was one of the assaulting party, as was my friend in front of me [Mr. COCKRELL]. He was also one of us to experience subsequent defeat around Nashville, and being ordered to bring up the rear of the retreating Confederate army, along with General Forrest, commanding the cavalry, did so in splendid manner and deservedly gained honor and credit for so doing.

He followed the Confederate army and was a part of it at its surrender.

The first great battle in which General WALTHALL and myself were together in the fight was that of Chickamauga, under General Bragg, and what a history it has, both in war and in peace. See Chickamauga to-day. No battlefield on earth, nothing in history is like unto Chickamauga. It was there on two separate days, in 1863, that men of the same kith and kin, after marching and countermarching for position, met in deadly conflict. WALTHALL was in that line. My friend from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] was in it. The field, after desperate struggle, was held by the Confederates, with a loss of near 30 per cent on each side.

To-day presents a scene not known to history. The parties who ought there then, amid the smoke of battle, grappled to the death, are to-day mustering together in a common cause on the blood-marked field and sleeping together under the same tent cloth and drilling and marching together as though they had never been enemies. What field can show such a history? It is a spectacle unique in history, without its parallel in all the annals of war. It is the romance of reality. How wondrous are the ways of Providence! "Behind a frowning Providence He hides a smiling face."

The Iliad of our long-exhausting woes having closed, Senator WALTHALL accepted the situation, returned to his home, resumed his profession amid the scattered remains of former prosperity and new political and social conditions. Life had to be commenced again under very embarrassing circumstances. With that heroic purpose that had ever marked his course he devoted his finest powers to the work. Before his unflinching fortitude all opposing obstacles yielded. The work of reconstruction was not only a grave impediment to the restoration of prosperity, but a most humiliating experience for the old residents of the State.

It was found in the South to be impossible to elevate an inferior race to the same moral, social, and political plane by a mere legislative enactment. Dissociable races must find by experience their working relations. This has often resulted in the total destruction of the weaker or their expulsion from the country. In the South the jarring contest finally mellowed into a tranquil submission to the natural laws of mutual interests. The life and services of Senator WALTHALL were not forgotten by a grateful people who had been given his finest service to promote their prosperity.

They elevated him to a seat in the body where his last labors were exerted for the Republic. There he knew he entered on sacred ground, trod in the olden time by the wise and great of the Republic, the demigods of the nation's glory. Their noble virtues and inspiring example were to him a pillar of fire by night and a directing cloud by day. To form a new nation and nurse it into vigorous manhood is the highest gift of the statesman. Next to these are the men who seek to maintain the established order and preserve in their integrity the institutions handed down by the creative men, such as our fathers were.

His modest deportment, refined manners, truthful and sincere men won for him honors and the approbation of all who knew him. Rarely in history do we find such marked efficiency united with such delicate sensibility. It is a notable instance where unassuming merit secured the prize that usually falls to the lot of aggressive audacity. He not only possessed genuine courage, but all the virtues akin to it. To a sense of duty and fidelity to the principles that actuated him, he added a ready intelligence and simple but captivating address that won all hearts, and none more than the Senators with whom he came in daily contact. He was not so ambitious of position as he was determined to deserve it, and was content with the conscious sense of having acted to the best of his ability the part assigned.

Senator WALTHALL belonged to that class of statesmen who devote themselves to the duty of maintaining the institutions of the country in their present state. He had a firm confidence in the capacity of the people to provide for their own local self-government and that separate States could best maintain their own local interest. He opposed all measures calculated to diminish the influence and power of the States. He knew that the Federal Government, with its vast prerogatives, commanding influence, and immense patronage would not only take care of its integrity, but was continually trenching on the reserved rights of the States. Hence, with anxious solicitude he guarded the rights and interests of the States from all encroachments.

In the smaller communities the liberties of the people were secure so long as they were in the care of and protected by the State. The growing influence of the Federal Government and the diminution of the State were manifest, especially since the civil war, and were calculated to arrest the attention of all lovers of the Republic as it was organized and put in motion by Washington and his illustrious companions.

These duties, often important and of grave character, were performed by Senator WALTHALL with such a sense of justice and regard for the feelings and rights of others as to leave no sting behind them. No enmities mar his bright and stainless record—only the memories redolent of tender sympathies and sweet and pleasing reminiscence.

The late Senator from Mississippi was a man just and tenacious of purpose, with a refined and penetrating judgment, capable of bringing together within a short space all that was necessary to establish, to illustrate, and to decorate that side of a question which he supported, and stated his matter skillfully and with luminous explanation.

He was a politician, sincere and courageous, believing conscientiously in the principles of his party; yielding to no temptations of temporary expediency in the defense or advocacy of its measures or in the support of its administrations. He was destitute of all injustice toward those who differed from him on the great principles of government or measures of administration, awarding to every opponent the same honesty and sincerity which he knew actuated and governed his own public life.

He took no short cuts in politics, but pursued the well-defined paths of constitutional government, believing that only by a strict adherence to our fundamental charter would honesty in the administration of our Government be secured and prosperity and happiness attend the people.

His masculine understanding and stout, resolute heart gave an earnestness of purpose to all his undertakings, which were always directed toward the preservation and improvement of his State and country and the happiness, prosperity, and advancement of the people.

Bred to the profession of the law, that first and foremost of the sciences, which quickens and invigorates as well as liberalizes the understanding, he rose to prominence at the bar of Mississippi, and at an early age was, from 1856 to 1861, the district attorney for the tenth judicial district of that State. The civil war in 1861 arrested for a time his advancement in his profession, but on the return of peace he resumed its practice and continued to rise in its honors and emoluments.

In the midst of professional engagements he was not indifferent to the claims of his party upon his time and abilities, and became a prominent figure in the national Democratic conventions from 1868 to 1896, in which, as vice-president and chairman of the Mississippi delegation, he gave to his party the benefits of his abilities and experience. That prominence in the councils of his party naturally led to his selection as Senator on the resignation of Mr. Lamar, and his repeated subsequent elections by the legislature of Mississippi in 1886, 1888, and 1892 attest the confidence and admiration of the people of that State, who have continuously honored and sustained him in all the efforts of his public life.

He passed from the camp through the legal forum to the Senate, where the integrity of his character was a shield against calumny, and no rumor or report ever tarnished its brightness. He kept the even tenor of a diligent and industrious application to public duties, seeking neither applause nor compliment, content in the satisfaction that he served Mississippi with all the industry and energy of his nature, and the United States with the best efforts of mind and body.

Such, Mr. President, is but a brief epitome of the public usefulness of the late Senator from Mississippi, to whom the Senate pays this day the last tribute of its admiration and regard.

Without discrimination, I can say that since my entrance into this Hall there has not been among us a more erect and independent spirit, a man of higher honor, of more manly mind or more firm and determined integrity than EDWARD CARY WALTHALL.

He sleeps now in the bosom of our Southland, the land he loved; the land upon whose altar he offered life and all that life holds dear; the land where the sunlight glints in genial glow and the quick twinkle of the stars come true and gentle; where the skies bended as a bow, but the bow is without an arrow; a land where the magnolia is green all the year long and her blossom-crown is ever white; where the nightingale's song is in tune and the "musk of the roses blows."

He sleeps there, and his dust, as it enriches and nurtures, imparts his own modesty to the violets that peep out in early spring from the little green mound that swells above the buried chivalry; and if his unaffected purity of purpose and simplicity of nature in life linger with his dust, their virtues will feed the little daisies in their growth, while his warm Mississippi patriotism will give aroma and color to the rose as it bursts with imprisoned sweets. Peace to the ashes of my comrade in war and in peace.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, on the 24th of March last our late associate, EDWARD CARY WALTHALL, united with his brother Senators in the memorial services held in this Chamber on the death of the late Senator Isham G. Harris, of Tennessee, and was among those who addressed the Senate on that occasion. Two weeks later, on the 7th of April, similar services were held in memory of his former colleague, James Z. George. Senator WALTHALL offered appropriate resolutions expressing the regret and sorrow of the Senate at the death of the late Senator and the condolence of the Senate with the family of the deceased and the people of Mississippi in their bereavement, and delivered an address which will no doubt be preserved among the historic archives of that great State. These two distinguished sons were long associated together in public service, and the recollections and views and opinions of the survivor have a special value for this reason.

But the occasion will always be remembered with peculiar interest by Senator WALTHALL's immediate friends in the Senate, because it was the last time he met with us here. He had been in a low state of health during the latter part of the winter, and for many weeks was absent from his accustomed seat. Through great care and attention he got over the attack, and when convalescing was advised to seek rest from his public duties. He was unwilling to do so, and believed that his strength would be gradually restored if he did not overtax himself. He resumed his work in the Senate and set his mind upon delivering the two addresses I have referred to. We hoped that when these duties were discharged he would spare himself and grow stronger as the spring advanced.

None of us realized when he asked at the close of the memorial services that the resolutions of the State legislature and of the supreme court of Mississippi in memory of Senator George be included with the Senate proceedings that his voice would never again be heard in the Senate. But his last adjournment had come. When we next met he was confined to his bed, and never again arose. Two weeks after the close of the memorial services, at about the same hour of the day, he crossed the dark river and left earth's scenes behind him.

My personal acquaintance with Senator WALTHALL commenced after my election to the Senate in 1887. But I had often seen him before then, when we were both engaged in the military service of the Confederate States during the late war, and I thus became familiar with his military career during some of the years that that terrible struggle continued. The regiment to which I belonged joined the Western army in the summer of 1862, and accompanied General Bragg in his famous march through Tennessee and Kentucky. WALTHALL was in that campaign as colonel of the Twenty-ninth Mississippi in Chalmers's brigade, and his regiment suffered severely at Munfordsville. The Mississippi and Florida troops were afterwards engaged near one another at Perryville, and later in other great battles of the Western armies, and his face and form were familiar to all the old veterans who marched and fought in the Army of Tennessee. It was soon after this Kentucky campaign that, in recognition of his distinguished services, he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general.

When I entered the Senate, it was my good fortune to be assigned to a seat near him. There was much in the history of the past to draw us together; our views were alike on many subjects. Our closer contact increased the admiration and regard I had long cherished for him. Though he never volunteered any aid, I felt the influence of his experience and sound judgment and example in reaching my own conclusions and determining my own action; and an acquaintance was formed which ripened, as the years passed, into intimacy and friendship, the recollections of which will always be revived with pleasure and satisfaction as long as life lasts.

I shall not attempt in this brief and hastily prepared sketch to do more than give a mere outline of his career. When Mississippi passed her ordinance of secession January 9, 1861, he was a resident of Coffeeville, and was serving his second term as district attorney of his judicial district. He was about 30 years of age, well connected, popular with his people, of engaging manners, and with every promise of a bright future before him. In his profession he had already established a reputation as a sound adviser and a fearless and successful advocate. The war soon followed, and WALTHALL resigned his office and entered the military service of the Confederacy in the early spring. He first served as a lieutenant in the Fifteenth Mississippi and was soon made lieutenant-colonel. Other promotions followed his brilliant career, until he became a major-general in 1864, and those who are familiar with the inner history of the closing months of the Confederacy tell us that still higher honors were before him if the struggle had been much longer continued.

His services were especially conspicuous on many occasions in resisting the tide of defeat and holding back overwhelming numbers until a successful retreat was practicable, as at Fishing Creek or Mill Springs, Lookout Mountain, and Missionary Ridge. After the last-named engagement I was separated from my command by the fortunes of war, but I have been informed upon high authority that when General Hood fell back from Nashville, in December, 1864, General WALTHALL was selected at the request of General Forrest to aid him in covering the retreat. This he successfully accomplished with a picked body of infantry, and he was the last to cross the Tennessee River.

When the banner of the Confederacy was furled and the terms of peace had been accepted, the soldiers returned to their homes and General WALTHALL, like the other great leaders of the South, went quietly back to his State and resumed the duties and accepted the obligations of private citizenship. For twenty years he continued the practice of law, first at his old residence in Coffeeville until 1871, and later at Grenada, winning his way to the very front of his profession and gaining its highest rewards.

But it was not easy to discharge the duties of citizenship in the States which had formed the Southern Confederacy during the years immediately succeeding the war. The plan of reconstruction inaugurated by the Executive in 1865 was accepted by the people; they returned to their usual vocations, and peace and order were gradually restored; but before the new State governments were fully organized, the plans of the Executive were overthrown by the legislative authority and the newly enfranchised freedman became a potent political factor under the second reconstruction. Years of strife, confusion, corruption, and misgovernment followed. They were hard years for the old inhabitants of the States which had been identified with the Southern cause. No other teacher than experience can enable one to form a correct idea of the trials and difficulties and perplexities of those days. In sections of country, as in many of the counties of Mississippi, where the white people were in a large minority, the conditions were aggravated. It was a contest for the preservation of our civilization, and in the end we regained control of our States because here and there were found such leaders as WALTHALL and George, his old colleague, with wisdom and prudence and determination to take advantage of suitable opportunities as from time to time they were presented.

When, as the work of restoration progressed, these representative men were sent by their States and districts to this Capitol, there were many who declared that the war had been a failure, that those who had once been in arms against the Government could not be trusted to legislate for its maintenance, and that their admission to seats in the Senate and House and to other high places threatened the permanence of the Union. When WALTHALL entered the Senate more than one-fourth of its membership was made up of those who had filled important positions in the Southern Confederacy, military and civil, and one in whose mind the recollections and prejudices of the past still lingered might naturally fall into the error of supposing that this was an element of weakness in the body politic. But this personal contact of Senators and Representatives who were on different sides during the civil war has been a potent influence in bringing the sections into closer and more friendly relations, and whatever fears may have been entertained of the effects of the return of the Southern leaders to place and power in the National Government, they have long since been dissipated.

It is worthy of mention that about the time of WALTHALL's death our differences with Spain developed into actual war; and if any bitterness or heartburnings still existed between the people of the North and the South, they were banished and forgotten in the presence of a foreign foe, and all were ready to unite together to carry the flag of our country to victory. How the heart of this patriotic man would have rejoiced had he been spared to us a few days longer to hear the message of the President nominating Lee and WHEELER among the generals of the army to lead soldiers of all sections of a reunited country against the armies of Spain and to see their unanimous confirmation without reference to party lines or to the old strife which was fought to a finish more than thirty years ago.

Although General WALTHALL was always ready to serve his people and his party during the years that he practiced his profession after the war, and on several occasions served as chairman of the Mississippi State delegation in the Democratic national convention, he held no public office till he became a member of the Senate March 12, 1885.

The Democratic party had gained a national victory in the campaign of 1884, and the newly elected President, in recognition of the generous support he had received from the South, desired the assistance of able and prominent men from that section to assist him in his Cabinet. He very naturally turned to Lamar, who was conspicuous among the great leaders on the Democratic side of the Senate for his learning, his eloquence, his sound judgment, his intimate knowledge of public affairs, and his widespread popularity, not in Mississippi alone, but throughout the entire South. Besides this, the conservative course he had pursued as a Senator and his courage in maintaining his convictions in the face of public opposition had won the confidence and admiration of many in other parts of the country besides his own.

When he became Secretary of the Interior, Governor Lowry did himself great credit and satisfied the wishes and desires of the people of his State by selecting WALTHALL to fill the vacant chair, and Mississippi, through her legislature, thrice ratified this action by successive elections whenever it was necessary to renew his credentials, his last election extending his term to March 4, 1901. In January, 1894, he had suffered from a serious illness. His recovery was slow and his condition unsatisfactory. He required change and rest from the engrossing duties of his office. His friends urged him to secure the desired release from confinement and responsibility by obtaining a prolonged leave of absence, which the Senate would readily have granted him.

There was much to make this advice acceptable, for he had won his way to the chairmanship of the Committee on Military Affairs, and a resignation meant a surrender of his committee appointments and some of the advantages which are connected with continuous service in the Senate; but he had a high conception of what was due to his people and to the country. He felt that his State was entitled to the service of two Senators and that his personal wishes and interests ought not to control his action. If the condition of his health prevented him from rendering his portion of the service due from or belonging to his State for an indefinite period, he felt that he should ask the legislature to select another to assume the duties and responsibilities of the office. As the result of this action, Mr. McLaurin, now governor of the State, was chosen to fill the vacancy and served to the end of that term. On the 4th of March of the following year, 1895, the new term commenced, to which WALTHALL had already been elected prior to his resignation, and his old associates welcomed him back to the Senate, gratified that his restored health permitted him to resume his labors and duties.

Before WALTHALL had completed half of his first term the President appointed Secretary Lamar to fill a vacancy in the Supreme Court. Opposition arose to his confirmation because of his connection with the Confederate cause, and it developed so much strength that serious apprehension was felt by his friends that he might be defeated on the final vote. A warm friendship had long existed between these two distinguished men, and WALTHALL felt that the services of Lamar were so valuable to the country that they should be continued, even if the confirmation failed. This feeling, and his entire unselfishness, lead to an interesting incident which has been communicated to me by a near relative of Justice Lamar who occupies a prominent position in the State which I have the honor in part to represent. He has given it to me in the following language:

While matters were in this uncertain state, Mr. Lamar received a most striking and gratifying evidence of unselfish friendship from Senator WALTHALL. General WALTHALL had implored Mr. Lamar not to leave the Senate and accept a Cabinet position, although it was more than likely that the General would be his successor. He now thought that Mr. Lamar would be the most useful man to the State and to the South that could be sent to the Senate, believing that he had so proven while a member of that body. He feared that the opposition to Mr. Lamar's confirmation would succeed, and, so fearing, thought that the State legislature should make him a Senator again, both for his personal vindication and for the good of the State.

It was his intention to bring this about by resigning his own seat in order to create a vacancy. This intention he communicated to Mr. Muldrow, the Assistant Secretary. The fact was stated by Mr. Muldrow to Mr. Lamar while the action of the Senate was still in suspense, and Mr. Lamar replied: "Sir, before I would permit WALTHALL to do that I would go upon the streets of Washington and break rock for a living."

So generous a rivalry in renunciation for the sake of friendship is not often encountered in these days of selfish office seeking.

Senator WALTHALL enjoyed the entire confidence of the Senate. He was seldom absent from his seat either in the committee room or in this Chamber. He was diligent in looking after the interests of his people as they were affected by the legislation pending here. He did not often participate at length in the debates of the Senate, but when he spoke his words had great weight and he always had an attentive audience. But though he was not a frequent debater, few Senators were more successful with the measures they took in hand or exercised a greater influence upon the legislation before this body. His judgment was sound; he kept up with the current events of the country, and he was a safe and prudent counselor. No Senator on either side of the Chamber was more generally admired and beloved, and his death has left a void that will not be soon filled.

But the sorrow and mourning has not been confined to his family, nor to the circle of relatives and friends who were near to him, nor to the Senate, nor to the city of Washington. The great State of Mississippi laments the loss of a distinguished son, who had served her long and faithfully, in peace and in war, under the dark shadows of the period of reconstruction and in the happier days that followed her redemption. In his lifetime she trusted him and showered upon him her highest honors, and the news of his death brought forth expressions of grief and regret from all classes of her people.

It was my privilege to serve upon the committee appointed to accompany his remains to their last resting place at Holly Springs, the home of his early days. Thousands had already gathered there from near and far in the early morning when our train reached the city. The cadets from the State Agricultural College served as a guard of honor and conveyed the body to the church where he used to worship with his parents; and in the afternoon the funeral services were there conducted in the presence of a vast gathering of mourners.

The loving wife was there who had accompanied him in many of his marches and campaigns during the war, nursed him when wounded, cared for him when sick, and added to his happiness during the years of their wedded life. Relatives and friends and old neighbors, political associates, and public officials had all gathered together to pay the last tribute of respect to his memory. Floral decorations in beauty and profusion had been sent from all parts of the State and were heaped around the casket and the altar. As the services closed at the church an organized body of battle-scarred veterans who had served under him during the late war came forward and each taking one of these floral tributes, carried them in their procession to the cemetery, where they were appropriately arranged in the family lot, and there, amid the fragrant flowers of spring, surrounded by a vast concourse of the people among whom he had lived, we laid him to rest in the bosom of the State he loved so well. There may he repose in peace till the morning of the resurrection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it had not been my expectation to say anything upon this occasion, and I do so now only because of certain things which have fallen from the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] which recall to my mind an incident I had not thought of in some years. Those Senators have alluded to the cordial and close relations which existed between Senator WALTHALL and former Senator Lamar. The Senator from Arkansas has spoken of Senator Lamar as the friend whom WALTHALL loved best. I happen to know from a very close and intimate acquaintanceship with Senator Lamar, that he regarded WALTHALL as his best-loved friend.

While these two friends had in common many high and ennobling qualities and characteristics, they came from altogether different stock.

WALTHALL was a native Virginian. He was sprung from those knightly Virginia cavaliers, who—

Rode with Spotswood round the land,
And Raleigh round the seas.

Lamar was born in Georgia, where he was educated and grew to mature manhood; and if the Huguenots, from whom he sprung, found their prototype in him, there has been no knightlier race than they.

The relationship between these two distinguished men was a very remarkable one. It was the relationship of Jonathan and David, and, as the incident related by the Senator from Florida illustrates, in the case of either, as in the case of Jonathan and David, if a crown were coming to one, that one would be ready with his own hands to take it off his brow and place it on the brow of his friend.

It so happens that I have personal knowledge of the incident related by the Senator from Florida. I was passing through Washington at the time when Senator Lamar's nomination as justice of the Supreme Court was pending in the Senate. I visited him at his lodgings. It was at night, and I found him in bed suffering from a slight indisposition, and the conversation between us was while he was in his room. He narrated to me the difficulties which were being encountered in securing his confirmation as a justice of the Supreme Court. It was the evening before action by the Senate was anticipated. He stated to me the facts which have been narrated by the Senator from Florida, that Senator WALTHALL had insisted that in case of his rejection, he would resign his seat in the Senate in order that he, Lamar, could either be appointed by the governor or be elected by the legislature, I have forgotten which, and take his seat in his stead. The purpose was that if he should be rejected by the Senate, he should immediately resume the place he had formerly occupied here as one of its members.

Senator Lamar stated to me then his intention—which I did not know was known by others until narrated by the Senator from Florida—that he would not permit Senator WALTHALL to make the sacrifice. Said he, "If he resigns, I intend to see that his resignation is not accepted, because I intend that WALTHALL shall know that I am capable of making as great a sacrifice for him as he is now ready to make for me."

Mr. President, I doubt if in all political history a parallel can be found to this incident. A seat in this body is regarded as the highest of political prizes, possibly save one, and men spend their lives in the effort to attain it, and here we have the fact of these two great men each ready and anxious to surrender it for the benefit of the other. They were great men, Mr. President, par nobile fratrum; and, if in the great beyond there is recognition between those who love each other here—and who can doubt it who believe in immortality—we know what sweet communion and converse there is between these two men, who so loved each other here.

Mr. President, as I have sat here to-day and listened to these most beautiful tributes, not only beautiful, but earnest, sincere, affecting, one thought has come into my mind. Some misanthrope propounded the question, Is life worth living? And as I have listened to-day I have thought that no better answer could be made to that question than to point to the life of this man. Surely life is worth living when, at its conclusion, in this great arena words such as have been spoken here to-day can be spoken of him with earnestness, with sincerity, and with feeling, and more particularly when everyone who listened to those words will gladly say they were the truth.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, a custom, in all ages and in all countries, even partially civilized, has been to preserve a remembrance of the virtues of noble men who, by deeds of conspicuous courage, marked fidelity, wisdom in counsel, and a generous consideration for the rights of others, have served their country and mankind. And this custom among men, so universal, is to continue, because human nature is so constituted that involuntarily it renders homage to these manly virtues.

So, Senators, we are here to-day to testify to and declare our admiration of all these noble and distinguishing characteristics as exemplified in the life and conduct of EDWARD CARY WALTHALL.

A native of Virginia, yet reared and educated and honored in the State of Mississippi, he combined in one person all of the best and ennobling virtues of the people of both States. He inherited the highest appreciation of family and personal honor, and he lived among a generous people whose manly courage is so common that it is not noticed unless it is combined with some marked mental superiority.

Thus bred and thus surrounded in his manhood's years, his temper was mellowed and his character was refined by his associations in the Church of England. He was no Pharisee. He never claimed to be better than other men. He was simply a true man, trusting in God and trying to keep His Commandments. His personal life was pure and his conduct, as a private citizen and in official place, was free from any suspicion of a stain. He was too proud to think of doing a mean thing, and he was too brave to consider how any duty or responsibility might be avoided.

Since the death of "her most eminent statesman," General WALTHALL was perhaps more beloved by the people of the State of Mississippi than any of her great men, and he was as highly esteemed and honored as any one of them.

General WALTHALL first obtained distinction among men as a soldier, and from Fishing Creek to Bentonville his name is associated, and most honorably, with many of the important events of the civil war. Statesmen who love their country rejoice that the United States are again a united people, and that we can now look back to and comment upon the great events and even the details of that war as matters of history and give a just measure of praise to the grand and glorious deeds of daring on either side and admire and honor that grander and more glorious heroism of our people as soldiers which enables them to stand firm under the most severe punishments and privations, even unto death.

Like the British garrison at Lucknow, fighting and enduring without food, hoping to hear the bagpipes of Highlanders, or like Captain Herndon, of the United States Navy, temporarily commanding a passenger steamer between Aspinwall and New York, there he stands at his place on his sinking ship, after saving all of the women and children and his officers and crew and many of the male passengers—all the boats of the ship could carry—and he gracefully lifts his cap to the loaded boats and goes down with his ship to the bottom of the sea.

This heroism of endurance is a Saxon virtue, and Americans in the civil war proved themselves Saxons and that this virtue had not lessened as it came down to them through their ancestors.

My personal association with General WALTHALL began in the civil war, and I was with him in many battles; and being his comrade, I was honored by his friendship.

A few facts concerning the conduct of General WALTHALL as a soldier may better show his character than general words of commendation.

On the morning of the battle of Lookout Mountain, General WALTHALL's brigade was on picket around the base of the mountain opposite Moccasin Point, and that picket line was about a mile long. A fog concealed the movements of the Federal Army. And thus a corps of that Army made a sudden attack on that picket line and drove it back up the mountain side toward the Craven House, near which was the Confederate line of battle. But General WALTHALL and his gallant men retired slowly, fighting as skirmishers an overwhelming force, and contesting every foot of the ground.

So determined and stubborn was the fight made by that small brigade that whilst it lasted I had time to march with my command from the old hotel on the mountain top down the old road and around the path on the bench to the Confederate line of battle near the Craven House, a distance of more than a mile. There I found General WALTHALL, still fighting with his skirmishers in regular order. And there that battle ended. And this is called "the great battle above the clouds." The fighting in that battle on the Confederate side was almost entirely by WALTHALL's brigade, and it was so desperate, though in retreat, that it gave much fame to the commander of the corps who made the attack.

On the next day came the great disaster to the army of General Bragg on Missionary Ridge. The Federal Army was marshaled on that day by the great general of the Union whose fame is known to mankind, whose son and grandson are now marching to the front in places of trust, honored by the American people. The military renown of Grant, of Lee, is now a common heritage of all patriotic citizens of the United States.

How full of hope it is to all true Americans to see the Lees and the Grants marching together, side by side, to do battle for our country.

But we will return to Missionary Ridge. The Federal Army assaulted the Confederate lines at every point. There was much desperate fighting, especially on the Confederate right. Finally the left of the Confederate line was turned at McFarlands Gap, and the Confederate center was broken.

General WALTHALL's brigade was then near, and to the right of that break. With the cool courage, which no danger could disturb, General WALTHALL instantly changed his front so as to face the Federal forces advancing on the left flank of the right wing of General Bragg's army. And that advance was then stopped. So the Confederate right wing was saved intact; and it retired slowly and in perfect order during the night across Chickamauga Creek.

And afterwards whilst commanding in the rear guard of General Hood's army on the second day of the retreat from Nashville, near Pulaski, General WALTHALL gave a terrible emphasis to the common learning of a soldier, that it is rabid folly to rush recklessly after even a defeated and retreating army, after it has had one night's sleep.

General WALTHALL never had a separate command. He was made a major-general during the siege of Atlanta. But wherever his command was placed, his coolness and courage and power of commanding were always manifest. His comrades loved and trusted him, and that trust was always proved to be well founded.

Prior to General Hood's Nashville campaign General WALTHALL was a perfect specimen of physical manhood—a combination of strength and symmetry—tall, graceful, and in perfect health. But that month of exposure, without shelter, on frozen ground, covered with snow, was enough to wreck the strongest constitution. He never recovered from the effects of that most disastrous winter campaign.

General WALTHALL won and held a high place as a lawyer at the bar in his State, and at a time when Wiley P. Harris and General George and other great lawyers were in full practice in the same courts. But I was not his associate in that branch of his work.

Here in this Chamber, as a Senator from the State of Mississippi, General WALTHALL became known to the people of the United States as a statesman, as a patriot, and as a Democrat who followed his convictions with a steadfastness of purpose rarely equaled. His long and faithful service here was interrupted only by his failing strength. The people of his State never faltered in their devotion to him nor in their earnest purpose to honor him. My time of service with our friend here was short, and others have described his long years of faithful labor as a Senator.

General WALTHALL had a great and distinguishing trait of character, which all of his associates must have observed. That was his unselfish and constant consideration for the rights of other men. You all remember the message which he sent in his last days by the Senator from Arkansas to the Senator from Wisconsin, with whom he was paired. That was merely an act proceeding from a principle—never to forget the rights of other men. Such a principle well followed, as our friend maintained it, might give to mortal man the power to look up and sincerely say: "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us."

Mr. President, the committee appointed by the two Houses of Congress escorted the body of our friend to Holly Springs, which was the home of his youth and early manhood; where his father and his mother and others dear to him were buried. That burial scene can never pass from the memory of any one of us who were present. The people of Mississippi came there to show how much they honored and loved this pure man, who had served them so long and so faithfully. Men of prominence from every part of the State were there; and rugged veterans of a four years' war were there, shedding tears over the remains of their leader. And lovely women and children, in large numbers, brought flowers, moistened by the evidence of their great sorrow.

The young soldiers of the State were there to do honor to the dead hero. Thus his remains were followed to the old church, where a memorial window commemorated the virtues of the father and mother of our friend; and the Bishop of Mississippi, a leader of men, read the burial service and taught lessons of wisdom from the pure character of the dead man.

Senators, such a burial is well worth a long life of labor, privations, and perils. And such a burial will never glorify any grave unless it be the grave of a good and great man.

Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the resolutions presented to the Senate by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 27, 1898, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 26, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ARANSAS PASS HARBOR, TEXAS.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a concurrent resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to prepare and submit plans, specifications, and estimates, and to direct and make a survey, if deemed necessary, for the improvement of Aransas Pass Harbor, State of Texas, and especially to make plans and estimates for the removal of the sand bar at Aransas Pass and the deepening of the channel across said bar to a depth of at least 20 feet and a width of at least 150 feet at the bottom, so as to furnish an inlet for the passage of vessels from the Gulf of Mexico into Aransas Harbor; and in preparing said plans, specifications, and estimates the Secretary of War, or such Government engineers as he may designate to do the work, may consider the feasibility of utilizing such breakwaters now at said pass, constructed by the Aransas Pass Harbor Company, or the utilizing of any part of the same, and the value such use of such breakwater or material may be to the United States in deepening said channel; and in the estimate of such valuation any permanent damage which, in the opinion of the Government engineers, may have occurred by reason of the construction of said breakwater to said harbor or pass, or additional expense to the United States made necessary by reason of said attempted improvements in future improvements of said harbor or pass, shall also be considered by said engineers and reported by them.

That the Secretary of War is further directed to report to Congress at its next session; and the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense of such plans, specifications, estimates, or survey.

The following committee amendments were read:

Strike out all after the word "estimates," in line 4, page 1, and line 5, same page, to the word "for."

Insert the following after the word "them," in line 11, on page 2:

"The engineers shall also report the approximate cost of construction of any breakwater of the said company which may be used by the Government, and also report the approximate cost of removing any part of said breakwater if it is deemed necessary to remove any portion of it."

Strike out all after the word "session," in line 13, on page 2.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment at the proper time which will have the effect of making this a simple resolution providing for plans and estimates for this harbor, eliminating everything in regard to this private company. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. If unanimous consent is given for the consideration of the resolution, the gentleman proposes to offer the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "harbor," in line 12, and adding the following:

"And report such plans to Congress, and also whether in his judgment such improvement should be made."

Mr. KLEBERG. That is in conformity with the usual form.

Mr. DINGLEY. That strikes out all the other.

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers the amendment which has just been reported.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, where does that amendment come in?

The CLERK (reading)—

After the word "harbor," in line 12, page 1.

Mr. DINGLEY. So that it remains simply a resolution for a survey and report?

Mr. KLEBERG. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. Without any appropriation?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

Mr. KLEBERG. The adoption of the amendment strikes out everything except the plans and estimates. All that is necessary now is to vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is mistaken, and we will have to adopt the amendment as proposed on the bill that has been sent up here. The Clerk will report what is to be stricken out.

Mr. KLEBERG. The other amendment will have the effect of eliminating that.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the following words: "And to direct and make a survey, if deemed necessary."

Mr. DINGLEY. Those words ought to come out.

Mr. KLEBERG. All that has been stricken out, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let the resolution be read as it will remain if the amendment should be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it as it would be if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to prepare and submit plans, specifications, and estimates for the improvement of Aransas Pass Harbor, State of Texas, and especially to make plans and estimates for the removal of the sand bar at Aransas Pass and the deepening of the channel across said bar to a depth of at least 20 feet and a width of at least 150 feet at the bottom, so as to furnish an inlet for the passage of vessels from the Gulf of Mexico into Aransas Harbor; and report such plans to Congress, and also whether in his judgment such improvement should be made.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KLEBERG, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POTTAWATOMIE AND KICKAPOO INDIAN RESERVATIONS, ETC.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5480) providing for the sale of the surplus lands on the Pottawatomie and Kickapoo Indian reservations in Kansas, and for other purposes.

*Be it enacted, etc., That with the consent of a majority of the chiefs and headmen of the Prairie band of Pottawatomie tribe of Indians and the Kickapoo tribe of Indians in the State of Kansas, expressed in open council by each tribe, the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to cause to be sold in trust for said Indians the surplus or unallotted lands of the reservations of the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians in Jackson County, Kans., and the Kickapoo tribe of Indians in Brown County, Kans. The said lands shall be appraised in tracts of one-half quarter section each by three competent commissioners, one of whom shall be selected by the two Indian tribes and the other two shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That either tribe may consent to the sale of its own lands and select a commissioner without the consent of the other, and when one tribe does consent to the sale of its surplus lands the Secretary of the Interior shall proceed to sell the same.*

*SEC. 2. That after the appraisal of said lands as herein provided the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to offer and sell the same through the United States public land office at Topeka, Kans., at public sale, to the highest bidder: Provided, That no portion of such land shall be sold at less than the appraised value thereof, and in no case for less than $5 per acre, and to none except persons over 21 years of age. Each purchaser of said lands at such sale shall be entitled to purchase two half quarter sections and no more: Provided, That any member of either of said tribes of the age of 21 years may purchase not exceeding one quarter section of such lands at the appraised value. All purchasers shall pay one-third of the purchase price at the time said land is bid off, and if not paid immediately the bid shall be rejected and the land reoffered, and one-third in two years from the date of such sale, and one-third in four years from the date of sale, with interest on deferred payments at the rate of 6 per cent per annum; and all sums, when paid to the receiver of the public land office at Topeka, Kans., shall, under rules prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and with the assistance of the United States Indian agent for said Indians pay to such Indians upon the recognized rolls upon which moneys are paid them by the United States in other cases the said purchase money of such lands: Provided, That in the case of minors the money shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States and held for such minors, respectively, until they have attained the age of 21 years. No patents shall issue until all payments shall have been made; and on failure of any purchaser to make payment as required by this section he shall forfeit the land purchased, and the same shall be subject to entry and sale at the appraised value thereof, or shall be again offered at public sale, as the Secretary of the Interior may determine.*

SEC. 3. That there shall be excepted from the provisions of this section the lands for two boarding or industrial schools located on these reservations, not exceeding 320 acres for each school, the amount and location to be determined and designated, after the assent of the tribe or tribes, by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of carrying this section into effect the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which sum shall be reimbursed to the United States out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands made under the provisions hereof, each tribe to be charged only with the expenses attending the sale of its own lands.

SEC. 5. That before any of the surplus lands belonging to either of said tribes of Indians shall be sold under the provisions of this section there shall be allotted by the Secretary of the Interior 80 acres to each absentee of said tribes, and also to each of the children of the members of the respective tribes which have been born since the allotments heretofore made were closed and to whom allotments have never been made, but such allotments shall be made and accepted subject to existing leases: Provided, That in making these allotments the said Pottawatomie children shall be restricted to the Pottawatomie lands and the Kickapoo children to the Kickapoo lands: Provided further, That this paragraph relating to allotments may be adopted or rejected by either tribe separate and apart from and without affecting the other provisions of this section.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs were read, as follows:

Section 2, line 32, strike out the word "section" and insert the word "act."

In line 2, section 3, strike out the word "section" and insert the word "act."

At the end of line 1, in section 4, strike out the word "section" and insert the word "act."

In line 3, section 5, strike out the word "section" and insert the word "act."

After the word "of," in line 4, section 5, insert the words "either of."

In section 5, line 6, strike out the words "which have been."

In line 8, section 5, strike out the word "such" and insert the word "all."

In line 10, section 5, after the word "children," insert the words "and absentees."

In line 11, section 5, after the word "children," insert the words "and absentees."

THE SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has just been reported?

MR. DINGLEY. Before consent is given, I would like to hear an explanation of the bill.

MR. BRODERICK. If consent is given, I desire to make two amendments to meet the recommendations of the Indian Bureau. This bill was passed substantially in this form two years ago, but was not accepted by the Indians. It provided then, as it does now, that before the lands shall be sold the Indians shall assent. This land is upon two small reservations. About five years ago the lands were allotted, and I think there remains upon one reservation about 3,000 acres and upon the other about 5,000 acres, making in all about 8,000 acres. It was not deemed best to make the homestead provision apply in any way to this land, because there is so little of it. Hence we provide that the Indians shall assent, and that thereafter the lands shall be appraised and sold at public sale for their benefit. That prevents the land from going into the hands of a syndicate or any speculation in the lands.

MR. DINGLEY. No payments at all are to be made to these Indians until the lands shall have been sold.

MR. BRODERICK. An appropriation is provided of $2,000 for the survey, but that is to be refunded.

MR. DINGLEY. No payments are to be made to the Indians on account of the sale of the lands, except as that money may be received from the sale of the lands, neither now nor any time in the future?

MR. BRODERICK. There is no appropriation to be made except for the survey, and that is to be reimbursed.

MR. MCRAE. Why do you put this provision in the bill?

To none except persons over 21 years of age.

THE SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears no objection.

MR. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas asks me a question.

MR. MCRAE. I will move to amend the bill. Why do you put this unusual provision in—that it shall not be sold except to persons over 21 years of age?

MR. BRODERICK. We want to make it impossible for a syndicate to get hold of it; and we also want to provide that a whole family shall not buy tracts.

MR. MCRAE. Do you think syndicates are usually made up of infants?

MR. BRODERICK. In some localities they are.

MR. MCRAE. I think you are very much mistaken. The homestead law provides that persons who are heads of families or over 21 years of age may enter land, and I see no reason why the head of a family under 21 years should not have the same right to buy a piece of land as one who is over that age. I think your theory of escaping syndicates is rather farfetched and will prove ineffectual in this as in other cases.

MR. BRODERICK. I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment.

MR. CURTIS of Kansas. The objection was made that if people under 18 years of age were able to buy this land, members of one family would buy three or four tracts; and it was the object of the bill to prevent that, so that one family could not go in and buy up a large quantity of this land.

MR. MCRAE. Why not follow the language of the homestead law by inserting "head of a family or"?

MR. BRODERICK. I have no objection to that.

MR. MCRAE. I move that amendment. Insert between the words "except" and "persons," in line 16, page 2, the words "to heads of families or;" so that it will read "to none except to heads of families or persons over 21 years of age."

MR. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, there are two other amendments recommended by the Indian Bureau that I desire to have made.

THE SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 16, after the word "except," insert "to heads of families or."

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out, in line 3, the word "and" and inserting, after the word "headmen," in lines 3 and 4, the words "and male adults."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out after the word "chief" the word "and" and insert after the word "headmen" the words "and male adults."

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. BRODERICK. I move to amend, on page 3, lines 5 and 6, by striking out the words "and with the assistance of the United States Indian agent for said Indians, pay" and insert "be paid."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "and with the assistance of the United States Indian agent for said Indians pay" and insert "be paid."

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. BRODERICK. One other amendment. I move to strike out the last word in the bill and insert the word "act."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, strike out the last word of the bill and insert the word "act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

TIME FOR HOLDING UNITED STATES COURT IN IDAHO AND WYOMING.

Mr. GUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 3088, to amend "An act to provide the times and places for holding terms of the United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892, as amended by the amendatory act approved November 3, 1893.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 3088) to amend "An act to provide the times and places for holding terms of the United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892, as amended by the amendatory act approved November 3, 1893.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide the times and places for holding terms of the United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That for the purpose of holding terms of the district court said district is divided into three divisions, to be known as the northern, the central, and the southern divisions.

"The territory composing the counties of Idaho, Kootenai, Latah, Nez Perce, and Shoshone, including any and all Indian reservations within such territory, constitute the northern division, the court for which must be held at the town of Moscow.

"The territory composing the counties of Ada, Boise, Blaine, Camia, Canyon, Elmore, Lincoln, Owyhee, and Washington, including any and all Indian reservations within said territory, constitute the central division, the court for which must be held at Boise City.

"The territory composing the counties of Bingham, Bannock, Bear Lake, Custer, Fremont, Lemhi, and Oneida, including any and all Indian reservations within such territory, constitute the southern division, the court for which must be held at the town of Pocatello.

"That any new county created out of any of such territory shall remain a part of the division out of which it, or the larger portion thereof, shall be created, but if a portion of a county of one division shall be attached to a county of another division, it shall become a part of the latter division."

SEC. 2. That section 6 of said act approved July 5, 1892, as amended by the act approved November 3, 1893, be amended to read as follows:

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect from its approval.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GUNN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PRENTICE HOLMES.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 5463) granting an honorable discharge to Prentice Holmes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the record of Prentice Holmes, late first lieutenant in Company A, Eighty-sixth New York Volunteers, and to issue to him an honorable discharge, dating from December 18, 1863.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call attention to the omission of the usual proviso,

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. There is an amendment of that kind recommended by the committee and which is to be offered. I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other allowance shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

CONTROL OF STREET PARKING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following conference report on House bill 5880.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5880) to vest in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the control of the street parking in said District, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"SEC. 1. The jurisdiction and control of the street parking in the streets and avenues of the District of Columbia is hereby transferred to and vested in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 2. That the park system of the District of Columbia is hereby placed under the exclusive charge and control of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the President of the United States, through the Secretary of War.

"The said park system shall be held to comprise:

"(a) All public spaces laid down as reservations on the map of 1894 accompanying the annual report for 1894 of the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds;

"(b) All intersections of parkings forming triangles, trapezoids, etc., at the intersections of streets;

"(c) All portions of the space between the building lines in the streets and avenues of the said District, after the same shall have been set aside by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for park purposes;

"(d) All land acquired for park purposes under the act approved March 2, 1896, entitled 'An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities;'

"Provided, That no areas less than 250 square feet between sidewalk lines shall be included within the said park system, and no improvements shall be made in unimproved public spaces in streets between building lines or building lines prolonged until the outlines of such portions as are to be improved as parks shall have been laid out by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That the Chief of Engineers is authorized temporarily to turn over the care of any of the parking spaces included in class 'b' above to private owners of adjoining lands, under such regulations as he may prescribe and with the condition that the said private owner shall pay special assessments for improvements contiguous to such parking under the same regulations as are or may be prescribed for private lands: And provided further, That where in any portion of a street more than one-half of the front is occupied and used for business purposes the Commissioners are authorized and directed to denominate such portion of the street as a business street and shall authorize the use for business purposes by abutting property owners of so much of the sidewalk and parking as may not be needed, in the judgment of the said Commissioners, by the general public, under such general regulations as the said Commissioners may prescribe.

"SEC. 3. This act shall not affect in any manner the provisions in the act of March 3, 1891, entitled 'An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for prior years, and for other purposes,' that no permits for projections beyond the building line on the streets and avenues of the city of Washington shall be granted except upon special application and with the concurrence of all said Commissioners and the approval of the Secretary of War; and the operation of said provision is hereby extended to the entire District of Columbia.

"SEC. 4. That when, in the judgment of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the public necessity or convenience require them to enter upon any of the spaces or reservations under the jurisdiction of the Chief of Engineers for the purpose of widening the roadway of any street or avenue adjacent thereto or to establish sidewalks along the same, the Chief of Engineers, with the approval of the Secretary of War, is authorized to grant the necessary permission upon the application of the Commissioners.

"SEC. 5. That when in accordance with law or mutual legal agreement spaces or portions of public land are transferred from the jurisdiction of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, as established by this act, to that of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or vice versa, the letters exchanged between them of transfer and acceptance shall be sufficient authority for the necessary change in the official maps and for record when necessary.

"SEC. 6. That the said Chief of Engineers and the said Commissioners are hereby authorized to make all needful rules and regulations for the government and proper care of all the public grounds placed by this act under their respective charge and control, and to annex to such rules and regulations such reasonable penalties as will secure their enforcement.

"SEC. 7. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed; but nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect in any way any pending litigation involving the validity or invalidity of the occupation of any public space or reservation in the District of Columbia."

And that the Senate agree to the same.

W. S. COWHERD,
JOHN J. JENKINS,
G. M. CURTIS.

Managers on the part of the House.

JAMES McMILLAN,
REDFIELD PROCTOR,
A. P. GORMAN.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The managers on part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5360) vesting in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia control of the street parking in said District, submit the following statement:

The bill as reported gives to the Commissioners control of the street parking practically as was provided in the House bill. It gives to the Chief of Engineers exclusive control of the park system of the District of Columbia, and specifies what shall constitute that system, as follows:

(a) All public spaces as laid down on the map of 1894, accompanying the report of the officer in charge of the public buildings and grounds.

(b) All intersections and parkings forming triangles and trapezoids, etc., at the intersection of streets.

(c) All portions of the space between building lines set aside by the Commissioners for park purposes.

(d) All land acquired for park purposes under the highway act of 1893.

The Commissioners are given the right, where more than one-half of the street is used for business purposes, to denominate it a business street, and authorize the use of so much of the sidewalk and parking as shall not be needed by the general public, to be used for business purposes under such regulations as the Commissioners may prescribe.

It is provided, however, that nothing in this bill shall affect in any manner the provisions of the present law prohibiting projections beyond the building line, except upon concurrence of the Commissioners of the District and the Secretary of War, and the operation of this law is extended over the entire District.

The Chief of Engineers, with the approval of the Secretary of War, is authorized to grant to the Commissioners the right to enter upon public parks, to widen the roadway of any street or avenue adjacent to the same, or to establish sidewalks. A method is provided for the transfer of spaces or portions of land from the jurisdiction of the Chief of Engineers to the Commissioners and vice versa, and both the Chief of Engineers and the Commissioners are empowered to make rules and regulations for the government and care of the public ground placed under their control.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this report when the bill passed the House upon which this conference has been had?

Mr. COWHERD. I think it was about three weeks ago. The bill itself will show.

Mr. CANNON. Well, we had before us a kindred bill—one dealing with the parks or with the squares, trapezoids, etc., of this District—last Monday.

Mr. COWHERD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I recognize some of the items embraced in this conference report as being on all fours with the matters embraced in that bill.

Mr. COWHERD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want to ask the gentleman what will be the effect of the legislation agreed to in conference, placing under the jurisdiction of the War Department all parks set aside or hereafter to be set aside under the highway act?

Mr. COWHERD. I really think that has no effect. So far as I am informed, no land has been set aside or acquired for park purposes under the highway act of 1893; and a bill to repeal that act has been passed by the House and I understand is now pending in the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. Well, why put in that provision?

Mr. COWHERD. If the highway act should not be repealed and parks should be acquired under that act, those parks, under the provisions of this bill, would be placed under the control of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman a further question. He was present on Monday last when the House, if I recollect aright, struck out the provision in the bill then before us touching the parks under the highway act. I ask my friend whether he recollects the action of the House on that matter?

Mr. COWHERD. I do not. I was present, but I do not remember the striking out of that provision.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; that was done. The provision was in that bill, as well as in this bill now reported, and the House struck it out. In fact, the Committee on the District of Columbia assented to the propriety of striking it out. Now, I will ask my friend, How extensive are these parks to be, if the highway act should not be repealed?

Mr. COWHERD. I can not answer that question. There are, as I understand, in the highway act provisions for acquiring parks outside of the city. Those parks under the provisions of this bill as now reported would be placed under the control of the Chief of Engineers instead of the District Commissioners.

Mr. CANNON. Now let me ask my friend another question. Under former legislation touching the District, wherever there is an addition made to the city of Washington—since, I think, probably 1893 or 1898—it may be 1891—that addition must conform to the plan of the city of Washington. The meaning of that is that out at Petworth, or out beyond Mount Pleasant, or away out northwest toward the Observatory, and generally wherever parks have been made within the last five or six years or wherever they shall be made in the future, those additional parks must conform to the plan of the city of Washington.

Mr. COWHERD. Has not that provision been so amended as to require that these additions shall conform to the plans on file and of record rather than to the plan of the city of Washington?

Mr. CANNON. Without reference to the highway act—whether it is repealed or not—the law now is that additions which may be made in the future to the city of Washington—and this law was passed several years ago—shall conform to the plans of the city of Washington; that is to say, there shall be such a laying out of the land as to give the parks or the reservations or the trapezoids referred to. Now, if I understand, the effect of the bill as now reported would be this: Although one of those parks might be laid off 5 miles away—or whatever the distance—it would be thrown under the control of the War Department.

Mr. COWHERD. I am inclined to think the gentleman is mistaken in the statement that these outlying additions must now be planned in accordance with the plans of the city of Washington. A bill has been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia—I am not certain that it has passed—

Mr. CANNON. I do not think that I am mistaken.

Mr. COWHERD. My understanding was that the additions hereafter made must conform to the plans which have been drawn in the District Commissioner's office—not necessarily the original plans of the city of Washington.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman will find I am right about this if he will examine the legislation.

Now, if I understand the bill as reported, all the parks within the District of Columbia, including the "Zoo," including the immense park beyond the "Zoo" to the District line upon which no improvement has been commenced—all these parks will be thrown under the jurisdiction of the War Department. That is the effect, I believe, of the provision of the bill as now reported by the conference committee. Am I correct?

Mr. COWHERD. I think that is true.

Mr. CANNON. Then I understand further that by this bill the parking on every street in Washington, from the front of the house to the street proper, would be placed under the control of the War Department?

Mr. COWHERD. No, sir; the control of that is given to the Commissioners of the District.

Mr. CANNON. I did not so understand, but I may have misunderstood.

Mr. COWHERD. Yes, the gentleman misunderstands. I have just called for the conference report; but the first clause in the conference report gives to the Commissioners of the District control of all the street parkings. Then the conference report provides that the parks shall be under the control of the Chief of Engineers, and it provides that such of the street parkings as are formed at the intersection of streets, forming triangles, trapezoids, etc., shall be set aside as parks, that those shall be under the control of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask my friend if this is not true, that under the practice and the law all parks, whether in the city or in the District, are under the jurisdiction of the War Department, and not only controlled by the War Department, but that their maintenance and care are at the exclusive expense of the United States Treasury?

Mr. COWHERD. I so understand.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if my friend will yield to me for a minute: If the gentleman has answered me correctly (and I believe he has), and if I understand aright what this conference report does, I do not believe that if this House understands it it will adopt the conference report, and I do not believe it ought to.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman permit me to correct a remark I made a moment ago?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman asked whether this does not place all parks in the District under the control of the War Department.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. COWHERD. It does not. It places all parks that are set out in the map of 1894, which accompanied the report of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, under the War Department. That was a map prepared for the specific purpose of showing just what parks were at that time under the control of the Department.

Now, the only other parks placed under the control of it are the intersections of parkings at the corners of streets, where this wide parking comes together and leaves a trapezoid or a triangle. That is placed under the control of the Chief of Engineers. Then the space between building lines, such as occurs here at Thirteenth street and New York avenue, where a very wide space is formed, more than is needed for public travel, and it is costly to maintain. That is placed under the control of the Chief of Engineers, it being thought that it would be cheaper to the Government to put that into a park than it is to keep up the pavement.

The only other thing placed under the control of the Chief of Engineers is land acquired for park purposes under the act of 1893. Therefore I was mistaken when I said in answer to the gentleman's question that these parks outside of the city were by this act placed under the control of the Chief of Engineers, such as the Zoological Park and others. They are not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Go ahead.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The placing of these intersections of streets and triangles and circles in the hands of the War Department will mean that the United States Government alone will have to meet the expense of caring for them, will it not?

Mr. COWHERD. I was coming to that. In the first place, these triangles and trapezoids that are placed under the control of the Chief of Engineers are, in large degree, as I have said, at the intersection of streets. A good many of them are now put under the care and control of the private property owner who owns the land abutting on that triangle or trapezoid, where they are too small to be used for public-park purposes.

They are placed under his control, upon the condition of his paying special assessments in the way of sidewalks, etc., and they will remain the same. The only things that will be put under the control of the Chief of Engineers are these triangles and trapezoids, larger spaces such as were provided for in the bill that passed the House last Monday.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That expense goes onto the National Government alone, does it not?

Mr. COWHERD. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If those are public places and public circles in the city, and the city has the use of them, why should it not be under the general expense of both the District and the nation, under this agreement of 1878?

Mr. COWHERD. That has not been the policy. The policy has been that all public parks are under the control of the Chief of Engineers, and the Government maintains them. But let me say that the conference committee were informed by the Commissioners that the expense of paying such of these small spaces as are now a part of the street, which under this bill will be placed under the control of the Chief of Engineers, and many of which are places much larger than the public need for street purposes—that the maintenance of the pavement is more than it will cost to maintain the parks.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, the National Government does not have to maintain the paving.

Mr. COWHERD. Yes; the National Government pays for half of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be, but it does not pay all of it.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I would like to say to my friend that as I gathered from the reading of the conference report, it does throw all the parks in the District under the War Department, and that includes these immense parks from the Zoological Park to the District line along Rock Creek, which, when it is improved, will cost $5,000,000 to improve it, and which was acquired not alone at the expense of the United States, according to my recollection, but by special taxation, half and half, from the revenues—

Mr. BLAND. Does the title of the land rest in the Government or not?

Mr. CANNON. The title of what?

Mr. BLAND. Of all these parks that are put under the charge of the War Department. Does the title of the land or the park rest in the Government, or is it in the District of Columbia? Could you go and put a public building on it?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that without examination I do not know, but that as Congress is the only common council for the District, without any limitation whatever, we could do with these parks whatever we chose.

Mr. BLAND. Well, I rather agree with the gentleman on his idea of this expense.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. But I wanted to know whether or not we could put a public building on a park, as we put the Library building on this park here?

Mr. CANNON. Well, we did not—

Mr. BLAND. Whether the title rests in the Government, so that we could take possession and erect public buildings on it?

Mr. CANNON. Well, the title either rests in the Government, so that we could, or we have such jurisdiction of all parks and streets that we can vacate them or do what we choose with them, under our power, acting as a municipal government, if you choose, or a common council for the District.

But what I want to suggest is that in the future improvement of this great park, which is now a wilderness, this legislation, if adopted, will throw the whole expense upon the Federal Treasury, to the exclusion of any expense to the District revenues, and I wanted to ask my friend if this is not so important that it ought to be printed in the RECORD and go over until one day next week, so that we can all have a little time to examine it?

Mr. JENKINS. I want to say—

Mr. CANNON. I have no desire to antagonize it if it ought to be enacted, and yet it seems to me, as I understand it, that the House would not enact this legislation if it understood it as I am inclined to think it is.

Mr. JENKINS. I want to say to my friend from Illinois that he is entirely mistaken when he assumes that this conference report provides for imposing the entire expense of maintaining the parks upon the National Treasury. He is entirely mistaken in that assumption. It does not do any such thing. It just merely places the control of the parks under the War Department, and the control of what is commonly called the parking is under the Commissioners; but it does not touch the question of expense. That is already provided for by prior legislation, and there is no attempt to change that.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, my friend is aware of the fact that whenever the War Department exercises jurisdiction over parks the maintenance of those parks is at the sole expense of the Government.

Mr. JENKINS. Why, there is no such provision of law.

Mr. CANNON. Well, nevertheless, it is so well established a custom that I have no doubt it would be followed in this case, as it has been followed heretofore, and I apprehend that careful examination would show the law to be that way; and when you put all the parks under the jurisdiction of the War Department, then necessarily the custom will be followed, and that is just what I want to avoid.

Mr. JENKINS. There can not be any objection to this being printed in the RECORD and having the matter go over, because the committee are entirely in sympathy with the position of the gentleman from Illinois on the question of expense; but I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the District Commissioners were represented before the conference committee, and the Chief of Engineers was represented there, and that the judgment of the conference committee is that the gentleman is wrong in assuming that this expense is going to be charged to the General Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why not let it go over and see whether there is any question about it?

Mr. COWHERD. This does not place the large parks under the control of the Secretary of War. It does not change, as far as that is concerned, the control of the parks the gentleman has referred to.

Mr. JENKINS. And there is no such intention.

Mr. COWHERD. It only affects those parks mentioned in the map of 1894, and that relates to parks that were then under the control of the Chief of Engineers. The only others are these triangles and trapezoids which I have mentioned. We have no objection to the request of the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me it may be so important that the gentlemen themselves and the House ought to have a little time to read it in print.

Mr. JENKINS. We will let it go over, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COWHERD. My understanding of the request of the gentleman from Illinois is that it may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. May not you have the bill printed as amended?

Mr. SETTLE. It appears as amended.

Mr. COWHERD. It appears as amended in the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the report of the conference committee and the statement of the House conferees be printed in the RECORD, and the matter—

Mr. JENKINS. And the matter go over until Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. And that the matter go over until Tuesday. If there be no objection, the matter will be so disposed of.

There was no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the House bill making urgent deficiency appropriations, which, I believe, is on the Speaker's table with Senate amendments, and to dispose of the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill and amendments.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill (H. R. 10378) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the payment of pensions, and for other objects, for the fiscal year 1898, and for other purposes.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, is it necessary to read the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SAYERS. I suggest the reading of the Senate amendments only.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Senate amendments. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 24, strike out "fifty-five thousand eight" and insert "seventy-eight thousand seven."

Page 4, lines 5 and 6, strike out "thirteen thousand two hundred and ninety-five" and insert "eighteen thousand seven hundred and forty-five."

"EXECUTIVE.

"Executive office: For the following additional clerks commencing June 1, 1898, and continuing during the fiscal year 1899, namely: Two clerks of class 3, $3,406.00, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Page 4, after line 10, insert:

"SENATE

"To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay to Mary L. Walthall, widow of the Hon. Edward C. Walthall, deceased, late a Senator from the State of Mississippi, $5,000."

Page 4, after line 10, insert:

"For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $15,000."

Page 4, after line 10, insert:

"For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers to committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, $5,000."

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

"For compensation and mileage of Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from the Territories, for the fiscal year 1897, $4,563."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if there is no explanation desired on the amendments, I move that the House agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent to bring the matter before the House first.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is there not a provision in the Senate amendments for the appointment of a number of additional clerks in some of the Departments?

Mr. CANNON. There was in the House bill. The Senate amendment refers to the same provision for clerks in the War Department that the House bill did, and takes the House provisions which were for certain clerks in the two Auditors' offices running to the 1st of January next and extending them to the 1st of March.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood that the bill—

Mr. CANNON. And also two executive clerks at the White House, which is entirely new by a Senate amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This is not the bill, then, in which there are eighteen clerks added?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, I think so; and were in the House bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The question I want to ask is this: I understand these clerks are to be appointed, although in the Departments, and not appointed under the civil-service law. I want to know why that exception is made?

Mr. CANNON. In my judgment these clerks are not under the civil-service law. That is my opinion and judgment; and so far as the House was concerned, and the majority of the House committee, it was intended that they should not be, for these reasons: That it purely results from the war; an increase of force necessary in the War Department to do the work in the enlistment of 125,000 people and the increase in the Regular Army. In the work in the Office of the Adjutant-General, the Commissary-General, the Surgeon-General, and the whole of them, it was found that it was absolutely impossible to do this great temporary increase of work, arising out of the war, without additional force. It was also found that it was impossible, with the correspondence in the Treasury Department and the auditing of the accounts of the War and Navy expenditures, to take care of that work, from the greatly increased expenditures, without an increase.

Now, there was no intention to make a permanent increase in the number of clerks either in the War Department or the two Auditors' offices, but only for the temporary stress of increase growing out of the war. Therefore it was the intention of the Committee on Appropriations of the House to make them temporary, and the majority at least of that committee understood that they were not, and intended that they should not be, under the civil service, because they are needed at once and only temporarily needed.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question right there in that connection?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. COX. Has your mind been directed to the proposition that is now before the House in the shape of a bill to give a Second Assistant Secretary of War?

Mr. CANNON. It has not; but it is not upon this bill.

Mr. SAYERS. This is an appropriation bill, and has nothing to do with what the gentleman from Tennessee suggests.

Mr. COX. I know it is an appropriation bill.

Mr. CLARDY. When are these clerks to be employed?

Mr. CANNON. They are to be employed at once. Those at the War Department were to terminate on the 1st of January next, and it is proposed that the time be extended to March 31 next.

Mr. COX. I am afraid we are going a little too fast in this line. We have got a bill to increase the force and put in position an additional Secretary of War.

Mr. CANNON. This has nothing to do with an additional Secretary of War, but it has to do absolutely with the clerical work that comes in on the War Department from day to day on account of existing conditions.

Mr. MAHANY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MAHANY. Is it not true that there are at present on the waiting list of the Civil Service Commission from 58,000 to 60,000 applicants—

Mr. CANNON. I do not know.

Mr. MAHANY (continuing). Who would be willing to take these temporary places if opportunity were given? Now, if it is thought advisable not to give appointments to those on the list, is not that a very serious reflection upon the efficiency and utility of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. CANNON. Well, the Committee on Appropriations were not recommending this bill for the purpose of blaming on the one hand or praising on the other hand the civil-service law. This is a temporary matter. These clerks are to go on duty. War is upon us and we need them at once—to-day. We do not have the time to ask the Civil Service Commission to certify, to hold examinations, and wait. We want these people for a little work temporarily, and we do not think we ought to stop the mobilization of the troops to enable the Civil Service Commission to perform.

Mr. MAHANY. That is a curious commentary on the civil-service law. Is not the gentleman in terror lest the reformers criticize his committee for this attitude?

Mr. CANNON. I am content that they should do so, and we will bow meekly to the criticism.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand there are a number of clerks in the War Department who have been removed under the civil-service law within the last six months, some within the last month. These men are eligible to any position after long service. They could be appointed to the eighteen clerkships to-day. They are tried men, that the War Department have had in their employ, experienced men who know the business.

Their heads have been cut off and they have been wiped out, and yet when the War Department, under the stress of the circumstances of this war, requires eighteen men, the bill provides that instead of allowing them to be appointed under the civil-service laws from the eligible list, from men tried in that very Department and proved to be capable of attending to the duties of that Department and the business of the Department, the committee comes in here with a bill providing that they shall be selected from the outside, from men who, as far as we know, have not been tried or examined. Without meaning any reflection on the gentleman or his committee, it is evident that the only purpose of the bill is to give to that Department eighteen political positions instead of selecting them from the men who have been examined and tried.

I have not been an ardent civil-service man, but if it is right to have the civil service in these Departments at all, if that law is to stand on the statute book, then I say it ought to be enforced from the beginning to the end. I will ask the Clerk, if the gentleman will allow me, to read the provision that I desire to move to nonconcur in.

Mr. CANNON. The privileged motion is a motion to concur, and that motion I shall make.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman not allow a motion to nonconcur in that amendment?

Mr. CANNON. If the House refuses to concur, it amounts to nonconcurrence.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. What is the advantage of having these people on the eligible list if we do not put them into active service whenever men are needed?

Mr. CANNON. I will try to answer both questions together. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says that there has been a number of clerks removed from the War Department within the last six months. I do not know whether that is true or not, but if they were removed under the civil-service law they could only be removed for cause.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There was a large number discharged from the Library force, and from those men more than eighteen efficient clerks could be selected.

Mr. CANNON. There is nothing to prevent the Secretary of War, if any one of these men is competent, from employing him for that purpose. But let me say to my friend that it is my belief, after some inquiry, that there is at least one-quarter of the clerical force in this Department protected by civil-service law that would not remain in any private employment for a holy month. [Applause.] They are almost absolutely useless and worthless for the public service.

Now, then, I did not intend to discuss that part of it. The civil-service law can be discussed and stand or fall on its own merit. This is a provision temporarily from now until the 1st day of January next. Authority is asked to employ people to do actual work. Now, if I was the Secretary, I would employ people that were competent and would do it. I believe the Secretary will.

Mr. HUNTER. I want to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTER. You state that the emergency is such that you have to suspend the operation of the civil-service law—

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; we have not suspended it at all.

Mr. MAHANY. Simply ignored it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUNTER. Is it not true that you can obtain the force more rapidly from the civil-service list to-day than in any other way?

Mr. CANNON. No; we can not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that there is a young man in Boston who has been examined and has a record of ninety-one and a fraction on the civil-service list, and if the appointment is to go outside, he never will be reached. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I do not know whether he will be reached or not. If not, it is probably because there are better men, although that is saying a great deal if the gentleman is a constituent of my friend from Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHANY. The point I desire the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to consider is that we have appropriated $150,000 to sustain this civil-service establishment. Now, when we need eighteen temporary clerks, the commission breaks down. As a matter of economic common sense, ought not this fact to seriously engage the attention of the American people?

Mr. CANNON. We will consider it the balance of the year, but in the meantime I hope the House will concur in these amendments.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Is it a fact that the commission is broken down, so that they can not furnish the clerks?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know whether it is a fact or not; and I do not care whether it is a fact.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Pending the request for unanimous consent, I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he will allow the House to have a direct vote on the proposition whether these eighteen clerks shall be under the civil service or not?

Mr. CANNON. This being not a conference report, but a proposition to concur in the amendments of the Senate, the question will be upon the latter motion. If we do not concur, that amounts to nonconcurrence.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There are other propositions involved here in which, no doubt, the House would be willing and glad to concur. I do not want to raise a question against the whole proposition.

Mr. CANNON. I will make no bargain with the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask this parliamentary question: Has a member the right to call for a separate vote on this particular part of the conference report?

The SPEAKER. This is not a conference report. The proposition is to consider amendments of the Senate to a House bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I ask whether a member of the House has a right to ask for a separate vote on the proposition which I have stated?

The SPEAKER. Any member has a right to demand a separate vote on concurring in any amendment if it is in fact a separate proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I will ask—

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon granting unanimous consent for the present consideration of the amendments of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. I now move that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment providing—

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it competent to move to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment?

The SPEAKER. That would be in order.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to move concurrence with an amendment which I desire to have read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Was not I recognized to ask for a separate vote?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was so recognized, and he will indicate the amendment on which he demands a separate vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire a separate vote on the amendment providing for these additional clerks. Will the gentleman from Illinois be kind enough to indicate the particular amendment?

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire that my motion may be read to the House. The amendment I desire to move would perhaps do away with the demand for a separate vote.

Mr. CANNON. The only amendment that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] can torture into having the effect that he speaks of is the word "temporarily" on page 2, line 3.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama, as the Chair understands, moves to strike out the word "temporarily."

Mr. CANNON. I should like to have a vote on that amendment.

Mr. MAHANY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question for the illumination of history. Is he in favor of "civil-service reform"?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman candidly, I do not know that I am in favor of civil-service reform as we now have it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama, as the Chair understands, desires to move nonconcurrence in the Senate amendment striking out the word "temporarily."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the motion to nonconcur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] moves to concur in the amendment with an amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to hear that amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"Provided, That none of the clerks authorized by this bill shall be placed in the classified service."

Mr. MOODY. I make a point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not think the amendment is subject to a point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I think it is. I hope at any rate my friend from Iowa will not offer the amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have done so. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman from Massachusetts has made a point of order. I am ready for a decision.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me very clear that if this amendment is to accomplish anything—and I suppose it is intended to do so—it must accomplish a change of law. The President now has power under the civil-service act to classify all the Government employees in the Departments at Washington.

This amendment seeks to control the power which has been conferred upon the President by the so-called civil-service act, and consequently it is clearly a change of existing law. I therefore submit that my point of order is well taken.

Mr. HEPBURN rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] on the point of order.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the word "temporarily" itself accomplishes the whole purpose of this amendment. If it does so, then the gentleman's point of order will not avail. But at all events the amendment which I have offered can do no more than declare with certainty the effect of the word "temporarily."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word. This is a bill that carries nearly $9,000,000 for the payment of pensions. The money for that purpose is exhausted—

Mr. BINGHAM. And there must be a payment made on the 4th of June.

Mr. CANNON. This must be passed at once, if the 4th of June payments are made. Now, the bill does other things that grow out of the present war, all of them proper within themselves, and up to this point we have had some sparring back and forth about the civil-service law. It seems to me the time has come for us to pass this bill. I do not think that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], or the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], or any other gentleman is going to put this into a civil-service struggle and let this pension appropriation be postponed, as it would be if we got the reformers in the House and the reformers in the Senate talking about the civil service. The war might, in the minds of some reformers, in my judgment, go to the devil, and so might everybody else, if they could get upon their hobby. [Laughter.] Now I hope that we may have a vote upon concurring in these amendments.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit a word or two?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word. The SPEAKER. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to say a word on the point of order.

A MEMBER. But the point of order is sustained.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to say a word on this matter. I should like to ask if it is in order to submit another amendment. I am rather surprised at the effort of my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] to allow persons who are getting into the civil service to stay there without a civil-service examination.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in charge of the bill moves the previous question.

Mr. MOODY. I should like just a word.

Mr. CANNON. Now I yield a minute to my colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. MOODY, and then I will yield a minute to my colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. FITZGERALD, before I move the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM. To debate the question?

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, all I care to say about this matter is that I think the whole discussion has arisen out of nothing. The law known as the civil-service law provides that employees in the Departments at Washington shall be classified under the provisions of that law. It contains no limitations which say that the employees who shall be permanently employed shall be classified and that those who shall be temporarily employed shall not be classified. It makes no distinction and no difference whether an employee authorized by Congress in the Departments at Washington is employed indefinitely or for a limited period. In either case he comes within the scope of the civil-service act, and must be dealt with accordingly, and I believe that all these employees, so far as they can be under that act, will be appointed under its provisions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised—

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised that my colleague from Massachusetts should have raised the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa is a perfectly proper one, because it would prevent the possibility of persons who are given employment under this bill for political reasons being incorporated within the civil-service-law provision.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I had had an opportunity, I would have presented an amendment which would have called for the appointment of these clerks under civil-service rules. As I stated a few moments ago, I have within the last two or three days received a letter from a constituent who, on a civil-service examination, obtained a percentage of ninety-one and a fraction—next to the highest percentage on the list. He is anxious to go to work for the Government, but under the processes that have been in vogue since war has been declared, that gentleman is denied the opportunity to be certified. All appointments are made as emergency ones, and no requisition is made upon the civil-service list. Yet my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] stands upon this floor and wishes that those gentlemen who are employed now for political purposes, and put in for political reasons, shall be given the protection of the civil-service law, although they have never passed a civil-service examination.

Mr. MAHANY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MAHANY. In the interest of the eternal verities, so to speak, I would like to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of the civil-service law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am in favor of the civil-service law being observed in the appointments provided for in this bill.

Mr. MAHANY. In all cases?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In all cases—I am in favor of the enforcement of the law as long as it is upon the statute books. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], in charge of the bill, a question.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to state to the House and to contend that these provisions of the civil-service law do not apply to these clerks.

Mr. CANNON. In my judgment they do not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not propose that any measure may be brought in here that is susceptible of the construction given to it by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], who is a member of this committee, without receiving my protest, and I will vote against the bill unless that provision is made clear.

Mr. CANNON. Well, the gentleman has that privilege. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GROSVENOR) there were—ayes 53, noes 15.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will not filibuster against this necessary bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman ought not to filibuster against the old soldier. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. "The gentleman's" attitude is perfectly proper. I can stand that much better than I can to have a bill slipped through here that conveys a fact that nobody knew anything about.

Mr. CANNON. Well, there is no slipping of the bill through, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. After a long debate here, in which it was stated that a certain provision was in this bill, the gentleman gets up and says to the country that it is a great triumph for civil-service reform if this bill passes.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TERRY. This discussion is not in order after the point of no quorum has been made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. Debate is not in order. The only thing in order is a count of the House, and the Chair can not count unless gentlemen are in order. [After counting the House.] One hundred and twenty members present—not a quorum. Accordingly, under the rules of the House, the yeas and nays are considered as ordered, and a call of the House is ordered. The doors will be closed. As many as are in favor of ordering the previous question will, when their names are called, say "aye," those opposed "no," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 51, answered "present" 27, not voting 135; as follows:

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following conference report on the bill H. R. 3663.

The report of the committee of conference was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3663) granting a pension to

George Barnes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to a new amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert "eighteen"; and the Senate agree to the same.

W. N. ROACH.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The House passed this bill granting a pension of $24 per month to George Barnes, who served two years and three months, and who is now destitute of property, with a family dependent on him for support and substantially helpless. Only a few months of this service was under the orders of the officers of the Government of the United States.

The Senate believe that the facts would not justify a pension of $24 for this soldier and reduced the amount to $12 per month.

After full and free conference it is agreed that under the circumstances of the case a pension of $12 per month is inadequate, but that $18 per month will afford the soldier reasonable care during the remainder of his days, and that sum is all the Government ought to pay, considering the short service of the soldier with the armies of the Government.

Dated May 24, 1898.

GEO. W. RAY.

ROBERT W. MIERS,

ISAAC A. BARBER.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the report of the committee of conference be agreed to.

The question was taken; and the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 184) granting an increase of pension to John P. Thomas, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to a new amendment, as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert "forty"; and the Senate agree to the same.

J. H. GALLINGER.

FRANK J. CANNON.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

As the House passed this bill to increase the pension of the soldier from $12 to $50 per month upon the ground that in all probability the soldier's disabilities which produce total helplessness are the result of his army service.

The Senate is of the opinion that under the circumstances of the case an increase to $50 is not warranted when you consider the doubt that must exist in the case, and it therefore reduced the pension to $30 per month, believing that this sum would afford reasonable care and attendance for the soldier.

After full and fair conference, the conferees are of the opinion that $30 is insufficient for the purpose indicated, but that $40 per month will afford a reasonable sum for the support and care of the soldier in his present condition. All agree to this, and the effect of the conference report is to increase the pension of this soldier from $12 to $40.

Dated May 24, 1898.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the report of the committee of conference.

The question was taken; and the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

GEORGE H. BALDWIN.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9210) granting an increase of pension to George H. Baldwin, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

GEO. W. RAY.

V. WARNER.

J. H. GALLINGER.

JOHN L. MITCHELL.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The House passed this bill granting an increase of pension to George H. Baldwin from $17 to $40 per month, the board of examiners having recommended $44 per month.

The Senate reduced this amount to $30 per month upon the theory that the facts would only justify that increase.

After full and free conference and an examination of the papers, the Senate conferees agree with the House that the facts fully warrant an increase of pension to $40 per month, the soldier having received his wounds and disabilities in actual battle, aggravated by actual exposure while in the service and in the line of duty.

The effect of the agreement is to give the soldier a pension of $40 per month.
Dated May 24, 1898.
